Mr. A. H. W. Stimson, who appeared before the Senate Committee on Finance in 1937, established his Republicanism by stating that he had been elected for various offices on a Republican ticket 28 different times. He indicated that he had no trouble in being heard on trade agreements, in part as follows:

I would like to say something to you on one reason why I am down here. Perhaps it won't be permissible. That is about this talk of locked doors. * * * They voted to have me go down to Washington and find out what it was all about.

So I came down here and I went right to the State Department. I didn't have to have any Senators or Congressmen to hold me up or make an appointment for me. I was a poor, impoverished farmer representing a lot of other poor, impoverished tobacco growers, made so under the so-called high protective tariff that never protected us.

Again we are able to call upon Mr. Culbertson as a witness. Mr. Culbertson said before the Senate Committee on Finance in February 1937:

I have followed the administration of this law for 3 years with a great deal of care. I have represented clients before the Committee for Reciprocity Information. In some cases I have opposed the reduction of duties in these agreements. I have observed the inner workings of the program and believe that the men back of it, the men responsible for it, are applying the principles of the law in the interest of the Nation's good.

These are merely samples of the many expressions of members of Mr. Treadway's own party relative to his fundamental objections to trade agreements. If these answers are not satisfactory to Mr. Treadway, he may wish to have the living representatives of his party, who made these appropriate replies to his objections, clarify their positions. It may be noted, however, that these Republican leaders outside of Congress seem to more nearly represent the views of more than 60 percent of the Republicans who approved the Hull program in a Gallup poll little over a year ago.

So we find the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADway] in a hopeless minority even in his own party.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by including therein a speech recently made by the Honorable John W. Hanes, Under Secretary of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE AND FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION APPROPRIATION BILL, 1940

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 5269) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture and for the Farm Credit Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference with the Senate.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is a very important measure. Altogether there are increases of $380,000,000 in the Senate amendments, and I feel we should at least have the right of a separate vote upon amendments 145, 146, and 147, the three largest items in the bill.

Would the gentleman from Missouri be prepared to agree that these three amendments shall be brought back to the House for a separate vote before they are agreed upon by the conferees?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the conferees on the part of the House assure the gentleman from New York that we will comply in every respect with the custom and the parliamentary procedure ordinarily observed in conferences between the two Houses.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Senate amendment No. 145 is the amendment which adds $225,000,000 of parity payments to the bill, which amendment was defeated in the House.

Mr. TABER. That is correct.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. And as to which the President made an adverse recommendation.

Mr. TABER. That is correct.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Amendment No. 146 added $113,000,000 for disposal of surplus agricultural commodities, which was also defeated in the House on a vote.

Mr. TABER. That was defeated in the Committee of the

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Amendment No. 147 adds an additional $25,000,000 for farm tenancy, which was also defeated in the House, and none of the three amendments was recommended by the Budget.

Mr. TABER. That is correct.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I wish to join the gentleman in making the statement that under these circumstances the conferees agreed to give the House an opportunity to vote on these three amendments. They have been defeated in the House. They add large sums to the bill and are against the recommendations of the President, and I want to appeal to the gentleman to stand by the President in this instance and give the House an opportunity to vote on it.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, in practically every appropriation bill that goes to the Senate, the Senate adds amendments increasing the amount carried by the bill. In the last 25 years I recall only one appropriation bill passed by the House which the Senate did not increase. They have invariably added items and increased appropriations, frequently by unconscionable amounts. Likewise, Mr. Speaker, there are few instances, and no recent instance, in which appropriation bills have gone to the Senate, where the Senate did not add some item that had been voted on adversely in the subcommittee, the whole committee, or on the floor during its consideration by the House.

So, Mr. Speaker, this bill differs in no respect whatever, either in content or routine, from the average appropriation bill messaged by the House to the Senate and returned to the House with Senate amendments.

In the bill now on the Speaker's table, and in the request to take it from the Speaker's table and send it to conference, we have precisely the same proposition we have here every time an appropriation bill is returned from the Senate, and the request which I have made is the stereotyped request which is always made under such circumstances, and always agreed to as a matter of routine, in the regular and orderly process of sending a bill to conference. It has never been denied before, at least not in the modern practice, and I am at a loss to understand why this particular bill should be made the exception to the practice of the House.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia, the ranking majority member of the subcommittee.

Mr. TARVER. I desire to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Woodrum] is in error in stating that the Senate amendment relating to farm-tenant loans was voted upon in the Committee of the Whole House. As I recall, there was no vote on any amendment seeking to raise the amount carried in the House bill for farm-tenant loans.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I may say to the gentleman that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Johnson] did offer such an amendment and it was defeated in the Committee of the Whole House.

I have often served on conferences where the Committee of Conference made a definite and positive assurance to the House that they would bring back certain amendments of the Senate in disagreement. I may say before I object that unless the gentleman from Missouri and the conferees who are to serve tell the House definitely that unless the Senate is prepared to recede upon these three amendments, they will bring them back in disagreement, I shall be obliged to object to the bill going to conference.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. When the gentleman from Missouri appeared before the Rules Committee, he was questioned relative to whether the House would have an opportunity to have a separate vote on these amendments or whether he would agree to stand by the action of the House.

He assured us that he would stand by the action of the House and will not agree to the Senate amendment. It is upon that assurance that a rule has been granted. Now, if the same promise is made to the House at the present time, I, of course, feel that there should be no objection, and we can save time by not bringing up the rule. Otherwise, of course, the rule will be brought up making it in order to take the bill from the Speaker's table.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, my friend, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Sabath], chairman of the Committee on Rules, is in error in the statement he just made. The committee did not exact of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cannon] a promise that he would stand by the action of the House under all circumstances. The gentleman from Missouri frankly stated to the committee that he would seek, as best he could, along with his colleagues, other House conferees, to maintain the position of the House. That is what the gentleman said, and not that he and his colleagues would not agree to the Senate amendment.

Mr. SABATH. That is what I intended to say.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I further reserve the right to object.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to say that the conferees of the House are always under obligation to maintain as best they can the position of the House, and our conferees expect to do that. Of course, conference with the Senate is a conference. Under the Constitution, the Senate has as much to say about legislation as the House, and it naturally follows that conferences are in effect compromises.

Neither House can expect to always have its own way about everything. It is a matter of give and take. In the pending bill there is a difference between the two Houses on 157 items. I am certain the House does not expect the Senate to yield on all 157 amendments. All that I can say is that the conferees will consider themselves bound under this resolution to maintain as best they may the provisions of the bill as it passed the House. They expect to represent the House faithfully and as effectively as possible in the conference, and will get the best agreement practical under the circumstances.

That is true of any committee of conference appointed by the House, and there is no occasion to expect that the managers on the part of the House will follow any other course in this conference.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, this is an unprecedented objection. The agricultural appropriation bill has always been sent to conference by unanimous consent. A search of the records reveals no objection to such a request since 1891, and on that occasion the objection was subsequently withdrawn. There is no difference between this bill and hundreds of other appropriation bills which have been sent to conference by consent. All of the circumstances enumerated in the objections advanced here this afternoon are to be found in the progress of every other appropriation bill through the House. The only distinguishing difference which can be drawn is that the appropriations objected to here are for the benefit of agriculture. I see no reason why the farmer should be picked out as the sacrificial goat. We have spent millions above the Budget in other bills and nobody has objected to such bills going to conference, but when the farmer comes up, of course, that is different. [Applause.] I trust, however, that in view of the low wage received by the farmer in comparison with all other wage scales, and in view of the low price received by the farmer for his products in comparison with his cost of production, the objection will be withdrawn and the bill will be permitted to follow the usual course followed by other appropriation bills, and always followed heretofore by the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects to the unanimous-consent request of the gentleman from Missouri.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, by the direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Joint Resolution 201, which I send to the desk and ask to have read for immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution. The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 201

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the bill (H. R. 5269) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture and for the Farm Credit Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, be, and the same hereby is, taken from the Speaker's table, to the end that all Senate amendments be, and the same are, disagreed to and a conference is requested with the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and the Speaker shall immediately appoint conferees on the part of the House without intervening motion.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Mapes] to dispose of as he sees fit, and may I inquire of the gentleman from Michigan whether he will be prepared to yield time to those for and against the resolution? My reason for asking that question is that I would like to determine as to how I shall yield on this side.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I am not able to answer that definitely at the present time, but I shall try to ascertain and let the gentleman know in a short time.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, the controversy which arises over this resolution has already been made pretty definite and clear to the membership of the House. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cannon] who is probably as good a parliamentarian as has served in this body in its entire history, has called the attention of the House to the fact that this objection is most unusual, it not having been made since 1891. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I think that the bill should be sent to conference and that this House should manifest its complete confidence in the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Can-Non], and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Tarver], and the others who will be the representatives of the House in the conference, to make effective to the best of their ability the will of this House as has been heretofore expressed by votes taken upon the amendments around which the controversy revolves.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN. A vote to send this bill to conference by no means binds those who vote to send it to conference to the conference report.

Mr. COX. Not at all.

Mr. COCHRAN. In other words, if the conference report is not suitable to some of us, we still have the right to vote against the conference report and the Senate increases.

Mr. COX. Of course, I think it well that it be understood that there is no thought that those voting for the resolution now pending would be in any wise committed to support the report of the conferees.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Dirksen].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, we are confronted today not with the merits of the farm bill, but with a question of procedure. We are confronted with the question of whether the agricultural appropriation bill should go to conference without instructions, or whether some strings ought to be tied to the conferees before they sit in conference, or perhaps, failing in all that, whether it ought to go back to the full Appropriations Committee for further deliberation.

I want to get at the very heart of the matter by submitting what I think is an uncontrovertible statement of fact to show the difficulties that will probably ensue with respect to some items in this bill.

This bill was considered for 4 or 5 weeks in the Subcommittee on Agriculture. Then it was considered in the full Appropriations Committee. Then it came to the floor of the House for 4 days and finally went to the Senate. When they finished they had written in $381,000,000 over and above the amount carried in the House bill. That represents $374,000,000 over the Budget and $258,000,000 over the appropriation for 1939.

Some of those amendments are very, very substantial, but it is not my idea that everything ought to have a string tied to it, but only those that are necessary to protect the integrity of this body. They include, for instance, an amendment to increase the amount for Bang's disease over $2,600,000. They include an amendment for forest acquisition, increasing the amount by $3,000,000. They put in $920,000 for the pink bollworm; $2,417,000 more than the House bill carried on plant quarantine; $225,000,000 for parity adjustment payments, after it had been defeated by a record vote upon the floor of this House by a majority of 13 votes. That happened on the 28th day of March and you will find it recorded in roll call No. 44.

They included another item that was not carried in the House bill of an additional $113,000,000 for the disposal of surplus farm commodities. Finally they added an additional $25,000,000 for farm tenancy and an additional $4,000,000 for forest roads and trails.

I think I see eye to eye with the chairman of my subcommittee in respect to a great many of these amendments, but this situation arises: When the farm price-adjustment payments were considered on the floor of this House it was defeated by a record vote of 13 votes. Four of the six members of the subcommittee who may serve as members of the conference were recorded in favor of price-adjustment payments. Having committed themselves by record vote, without seeking to do injury to the gentlemen or to prophesy what their attitude in conference would be, yet they are recorded on that item in favor of it. When you have the Members of the other body sitting on the other side of the conference table fully pledged to that item, and you have four of the six House conferees who voted for that item, it is a pretty fair assumption, without aspersing the integrity of any member of the conference committee, that there is a likelihood that they will yield on that point, and in spite of the House action it will not be brought back in disagreement.

Now, if it is not brought back in disagreement, there is no opportunity for a separate vote. We vote the conference report up, we vote it down, or we can recommit it with instructions; but unless you instruct the conferees today or send this bill to the House Agricultural Appropriations Subcommittee and then the full committee, there will be no opportunity to get a separate vote upon the item on which the House is already recorded, and no separate vote on other important items.

I have a farming community, six counties. I have telegrams galore on my desk in the office from officers of the local Farm Bureau Federation, asking me to support the price-adjustment payments. If I were only mindful of my own political future, I would not think anything about it and I would not be in the Well of this House today, but must I remind you on that item, gentlemen, that 3 weeks ago the President of the United States, in a press conference, addressed to us informally this reproach when he said, "Congress welched on parity taxes." He says that we, the Congress, owe him $212,000,000 for the price-adjustment payments last year, and we found no taxes in order to offset that item.

Secondly, here is the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture before the Senate Appropriations Committee on the 13th of April 1939. When he was responding to a question from the Republican leader in that body, Secretary Wallace said:

I would merely say, answering you in the same spirit in which you ask the question, I would say that I would feel it would be exceedingly unsound to take out of the Treasury of the United States the additional parity payments above the soil-conservation payments as a permanent proposition, and it seems to me that there would have to be a very unusual emergency, indeed, to warrant taking it out of the Treasury without finding some method of financing that would bring what is going on home to the industries involved, both from the farm side and also from where the taxes come.

Then the Senator said:

Well, in your mind, does that unusual emergency exist at the present time?

The Secretary of Agriculture said:

I do not think anyone can say whether it is right now.

I have for my authority the President of the United States. I have the Secretary of Agriculture on my side. I have the Budget Bureau on my side.

Neither in this session nor in the last session of Congress has a single suggestion been made to devise taxes to offset this item. No suggestion to that effect has come from the Ways and Means Committee. No such suggestion has come from the chairman of the subcommittee handling this bill. No bill has been introduced. Instead, the Congress flaunts the President, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Budget Bureau by voting borrowed funds without so much as an effort to provide the revenues to balance such an expenditure. I am sure that while all farmers, including those in my district are interested in parity payments so long as loose fiscal policies continue, they are also interested in the ever-expanding national debt as a result of these borrowings, the ever-increasing interest on the debt, and in the steady march of the Nation toward fiscal degeneracy. There is small virtue in paying parity payments to farmers and then taking away from them twice that amount in direct and indirect taxes.

In view of the speech that the President of the United States made to the Retail Federation last night-and I was present to hear it—I feel it is my duty to protect the integrity of this House. The fact that at least four of the members of the subcommittee out of a total of six who may sit with the Senators in conference and who are already at least pledged in principle by a record vote on the 28th day of March of this year may augur against the possibility of this House getting a separate vote on that item in spite of the fact that the President says we still owe parity payments from last year and the Secretary of Agriculture has not yet discerned the emergency unless we can first find the offsetting taxes. Having in mind the interest of the fiscal solidarity of this country, I think there is nothing for me to do at the present time, than to take this stand and to see that we get a separate vote, that the integrity of the House may be preserved.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If I understand the gentleman correctly, four of the Members who will probably serve on the conference committee have voted in favor of the principle involved in the $225,000,000 amendment as well as the $113,000,000 amendment. Will the gentleman correct me in this if I am in error? If these two items of $338,000,000 stay in the bill as here presented this money could be used in connection with cotton, and those who receive the benefits of those cotton payments could still put the cotton in the loan similar to that now held by the Commodity Credit Corporation. Am I correct?

Mr. DIRKSEN. That may be correct, but I would rather not open up the substantive provisions of the bill since a procedural matter is pending before the House at the present time. This deals entirely with the feasibility of letting the conferees of the House go into conference without instructions. Mr. Speaker, this can be done, you can vote down the previous question and the rule; and that, of course, will open it up for amendments. Then we can submit three amendments covering the $113,000,000 for commodity disposal, the $225,000,000 for parity payments and the $25,000,-000 additional for the Farm Security Administration for farm tenant loans. In view of the action that was taken in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and also by this House on a record vote, it is only fair to the Members that this kind of instruction should go along with the bill to conference so that there will be no agreement on these matters and that they will be brought back for a separate record vote.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not want to be in the position of reflecting upon the chairman of the subcommittee. He is absolutely right when he states that this is a rather unusual procedure, but these are rather unusual times, and these are unusual circumstances; so unusual proceedings are constantly at hand. I would not reflect upon him for anything because we stood shoulder to shoulder for weeks in the committee and then on this floor seeking to protect the bill and hold the appropriation somewhere close to the Budget; but the $225,000,000 item came up and there was a record vote on it. You can do your own assuming and inferring as to what might happen in the conference committee on this particular item. I think it is only fair in view of the action taken in this House when the bill was originally under consideration, that the conferees be instructed. There is one way to do it, that is to vote down the previous question and offer these suggestions in the form of amendments; then the conferees can go into conference with the Senate under the instructions of the House.

In response to the statement that a vote against the previous question constitutes a vote against parity payments, that is the sheerest nonsense. If that amendment is brought back in disagreement, the membership stands in precisely the same position that it did when the appropriation bill first came before the House in March, and each Member will have an opportunity to vote for or against the retention of this item.

Oddly enough, most attention has centered on parity payments and very little on the other large item of $113,000,000 for the disposal of surplus farm commodities by means of export subsidies, diversion of relief, and diversion to other than normal channels of trade. As the bill left the House, it contained $90,000,000 for this item. That $90,000,000 equals 30 percent of the customs duties for the previous calendar year. The Senate wrote in an additional $113,000,000, making a total of $203,000,000 for that purpose. The $90,000,000, of course, is assured because it is authorized by section 32 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. The $103,000,000 will be borrowed funds, since revenues are infinitely less than the expenditures and no additional taxes have been provided for this purpose.

In connection with this item, let me point out that under this program for the years 1936, 1937, 1938, and 1939, such a staple item as lard was not included, either in that part of the program relating to encouragement of exports, diversion to byproducts, or diversion to relief. Now, very recently as every Member knows, the experiment to dispose of surpluses through regular food stores has been undertaken by means of special orange and blue stamps, to families that are on relief. I note that the items which may be obtained for these special food stamps embrace butter, shell eggs, dry edible beans, dried prunes, oranges, fresh grapefruit, wheat flour, graham flour, and corn meal.

Now the amazing thing is that while the program for which funds are made available in the bill, calls for adjustment payments on corn, yet there is no indication of assistance in finding outlet for the lard into which that corn will be converted. The Department of Rural Economics of Ohio State University estimates that 700,000,000 pounds of lard will be waiting for a market outside of the United States and yet there is no hint that lard will figure in the export subsidy plan or in the surplus-food disposal plan now being conducted experimentally at Rochester and Dayton. This is a matter of highest importance, and I am of the opinion that that item should be separately handled. If, however, it is agreed to in conference, all hope of putting that program on a basis more equitable to all sections of the country will be definitely foreclosed.

I believe the House is sufficiently informed on the issues involved and if you believe that the conferees should be instructed, your course is to vote down the previous question and open the rule for the necessary amendments.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Tarver].

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, there has already been pointed out to you the incongruity of our economy-minded friends' undertaking to effect drastic economies by pursuing unusual tactics of the character which they are now pursuing in this House only when a measure is reached which vitally affects the agricultural population of this country. The chairman of our subcommittee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cannon] has pointed out that the procedure of this character with reference to an agricultural appropriation bill has not been followed in this House since 1891.

No man is justified in assuming that because four members of the subcommittee as Members of this House voted upon the passage of this bill through the House in favor of parity payments that those members of the subcommittee in the event of a conference with the Senate will not as best they can reflect the attitude of the House in an endeavor to bring about an agreement with the Senate which will be satisfactory to the membership of the House. The past record, if I may mention the fact, of our subcommittee justifies my saying that there are no Members of the House who have been more earnest in their endeavors to effect economies than the members of this particular subcommittee. Year after year we have brought back to you here in the House a conference report on the agricultural appropriation bill running many millions of dollars below the figures which were placed in these bills by the Senate; and there is no reason why under the circumstances which exist today the House should not have sufficient confidence in the membership of our subcommittee to anticipate that they will endeavor to bring back to the House a conference report which will merit and receive its approval.

As the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cochran] pointed out, the conferees have no authority to enter into any agreement which will make effective this legislation. Whatever they do must in the last eventuality receive the approval of this House before it can become effective, and there is no reason other than the unfounded fears of certain gentlemen who are perhaps making some political capital out of this particular issue to anticipate that your subcommittee is going to endeavor to put anything over on the House. It could not do it if it had the intention to do it.

Let me say that I am in absolute accord with the President of the United States in his views that the Congress ought to provide revenue with which these farm benefits shall be paid. I have frequently expressed this viewpoint not only on the floor but in communications with my constituents. The statement has been made that the President has evidenced his opposition to the parity-payment provision of the bill as written in the Senate. This in my judgment is not correct. The President of the United States, in my judgment, is in favor of the provision of parity payments, but he insists in connection with that position that Congress ought to make provision for raising the revenue with which those payments are paid; and in doing that I think his position is absolutely sound.

If a mistake has been made with reference to this farm program when was it made? It was made when you passed the Agricultural Adjustment Act in 1938 and inferentially, at least, promised the farmers of the country that you would provide parity payments if they would subject themselves to the restrictions on agriculture provided in that act. I voted against the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 on its passage through this body.

The gentleman from Virginia, who it appears is one of the persons in the House who is interested in this very unusual procedure, voted for that act; the gentleman from Virginia was the chairman of the subcommittee handling a bill which during the last session finally passed with a Senate amendment providing $212,000,000 in parity payments for the year 1938. The gentleman from Virginia, in my judgment, is not in position to object to the procedure which the Senate has sought to institute in the making of these parity payments, although I do not wish that statement to be understood by you as indicating that I, as a Member, would not do what I could to sustain the position which has been evidenced by the House on this particular issue, or at least to reach an agreement with the Senate conferees satisfactory to the House.

There certainly appears to me no reason why the House, so far as this bill is concerned, should make a distinction against the agricultural interests of the country by insisting that the bill should not go to conference in the usual way, with the liberty on the part of the conferees, as a matter of give and take with the Senate, to work out, if they can, some agreement with the Senate which will be satisfactory to the membership of both bodies. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Gilchrist]. Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Speaker, a fact is a thing that admits of no doubt. It is a thing that corresponds perfectly with everything that is or has been or shall be.

As a Republican and on the admitted facts, I speak for the appropriations contained in this bill. The statement is made that the present vote affects simply a question of procedure; but we know that this is not true. Criticism of this procedure is, after all, merely a pretext. The real question is whether we are going to support these appropriations or not. Why should a quibble about procedure be brought into this House now, being a procedure that has not been invoked before for nearly a half century. Why is this strange procedure now called out to beat the just cause of the farmers? It is a fact that the platform of my party in 1932 promised control of acreage of land under cultivation as an aid to the efforts of the farmer to balance production. That is what this appropriation will do. It is a fact that the platform of the Republican Party in 1936 promised to protect land resources, which is soil conservation as contained in this bill, and also to provide in the case of agricultural products of which there is an exportable surplus, payment of reasonable benefits for certain uses. That, Mr. Speaker, is a fact which cannot be controverted. And that is what this bill will do.

It is also true that the Democratic platform of 1936 promised parity for farmers. It promised to raise farm income to pre-war purchasing power. The appropriations in this bill are the only things before this House or the only things that can come before the House which will restore parity, promised by both of the parties. Averaging the situation now, the farmer does not have parity. Everybody knows that. It has been proven over and over again that he stands in the relation of about 66 or 72 as compared to 120 for other industries. These things are facts.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas for a question.

Mr. HOPE. It is a fact also that even with the passage of this bill the farmer will still fall short of parity?

Mr. GILCHRIST. Certainly. This bill will not give the farmer parity. It will give him only about 75 percent of parity

Mr. Speaker, the question before us today is, Shall you keep your promise? Is your promise a mere scrap of paper? Is that what either or both of the parties is going to say here today? Will you say to the farmer, "Oh, well, we love you very much indeed, but we love others still better and we have decided to give you up; we will break the promise we made to you"?

If that is the purpose, I say to you that this innovation in procedure will not be allowed to fool the farmers all the time. Republicans are now here arguing that the President and the Secretary of Agriculture are against this appropriation. If this be so, then I must add that I do not know just when this side of the aisle became convinced that it should come into such complete agreement with the President and the Secretary of Agriculture. But I doubt that it is so. It may not be. Anyway the farmers are entitled to this money. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Sabath].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I was hoping that politics would not enter into this debate; therefore, I regret that the gentleman from Iowa has brought the charge that the Democratic Party is not keeping its pledges and promises to the farmers of the country. No administration in the history of our Nation has done as much for the farmers as has the present one. As to the objection made today with reference to this bill, it comes from the Republicans, and not from the Democrats. I am always desirous of giving the membership the right and privilege to vote on every question. As chairman of the Rules Committee, I called a meeting of that committee yesterday at 2 o'clock so that a rule could be brought in to take this bill from the Speaker's table and have it sent to conference. It therefore grieves me that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cannon], for whom I have the highest regard, should state that only when an agricultural bill is under consideration are objections raised. I say that objections are raised to the unreasonable increase inserted in this bill by the Senate which were voted down by the House. As the bill comes to us from the other side it carries $391,000,000 more than the House bill and $258,000,000 more than the 1938 appropriation, although in that year we had drought-stricken and flood-ravaged sections to consider, and agricultural prices were lower than they are today. This bill now carries $376,000,000 more than the sum recommended by the Director of the Budget.

Mr. Speaker, in years gone by I have known of occasions, and I think the gentleman from Missouri has, too, when the House instructed or secured a pledge from its conferees as to carrying out the wishes of the House. That is a question I asked him yesterday, and that is what he repeated on the floor of the House. I may not have used the same language, but, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] stated later on, that is virtually the fact. I believe that we can assure the House that its will is going to be carried out to the best of our ability.

I think it would be well to take this bill from the Speaker's table and send it to conference. We can trust the conferees, in my opinion, because they are men in whom we have the utmost confidence, notwithstanding the fact that they have voted perhaps for these particular appropriations as inserted by the Senate, which increase the appropriations contained in the bill by over $380,000,000. In the interest of the gentlemen from Georgia and of some of my Republican friends, may I say that this bill as it left the House carried appropriations totaling nearly $900,000,000 for the agricultural industry of this country. I feel that we have again demonstrated our desire to help the farmers with deeds and not with empty promises, as the Republicans have done in years gone by.

Mr. Speaker, while I favor the passage of the rule, I do so with the understanding that the assurances of the gentleman from Missouri will be kept, in that the House conferees will not yield on the Senate amendments, especially on the three largest items. Further, that the conferees will report to the House should the Senate refuse to yield so that the membership may be afforded the opportunity of a record vote on the amendments. It has been and will always be my aim to give the membership the right to vote on any important legislation.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. Lemke].

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, I am for sending this bill to conference. [Applause.] I know that the $225,000,000 for parity payments is only a drop in the bucket. I know that agriculture has been double-crossed, criss-crossed, bisected, and quartered here in this Congress. It comes with poor grace for my friends to object to this bill, especially when I know that some of them were elected to Congress because their predecessors told the farmers they did not know what they wanted.

The time has come when we should pay more attention to the 32,000,000 men, women, and children on the farms than to the few supposed imaginary enemies in foreign lands. [Applause.] We have voted millions and billions for so-called foreign aggression, which you called national defense, but we refuse to vote $225,000,000 for the farmer, who is the real national defense. If you put the farmer where he belongs, on an equality with industry, and give him cost of production, then you will not have to be fooling each year with these appropriations.

I appeal to you, my conservative friends on both sides of the aisle, to get busy and give us cost of production, and we will take care of ourselves and will not come back here and beg for $225,000,000 where we ought to ask for $7,500,000,000 to balance the farmers' budget. The promised parity that we gave to the farmer in the 1934 and 1938 Farm Acts was a fraud and a deception to begin with. It did not give him cost of production. Now we refuse even to comply with that fraud and deception. We made the farmer believe that we were going to subsidize him and then we fleeced him.

This situation cannot be laughed at; it cannot be joked at. You promised the farmer parity and you have not given him parity. It is a hallucination to say that $225,000,000 will give him parity. It will do nothing of the kind. The Secretary of Agriculture has testified over on the Senate side that if the farmer got cost of production he would get an increase in his income of $7,500,000,000. That would give him real parity and not make-believe "Alice in Wonderland" parity. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Woodrum].

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and thirteen Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. CLASON and Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia rose.

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order in view of the large number that are present.

The SPEAKER. Under the circumstances, the Chair is not authorized to recognize the gentleman inasmuch as the Chair had already announced no quorum present. A constitutional question is raised.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, five or six more came in over here.

The SPEAKER. Were these gentlemen here present when the Chair was counting?

Were the gentlemen in the rear of the hall who are holding up their hands not present when the Chair counted a moment ago?

The Chair will count the present membership again. [After counting.] Two hundred and twenty-seven Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Woodrum].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I wish to comment on the suggestion that has been made that there are many unusual things about this procedure. In the first place let us recall for a moment what the general rules of the House provide when a House bill such as this is returned to the House from the Senate. The general rules of the House provide that the bill with the amendments shall go to the Appropriations Committee for the Appropriations Committee to consider the amendments and then report the bill back to the House with amendments and with their recommendations as to the amendments, in which event the House has an opportunity to go into the Committee of the Whole and consider the Senate amendments, the bill then being reported to the House and considered in the House. This is the general rules of the House. This practice of asking unanimous consent to send a bill to conference, while it is very generally indulged in, is an exception to the rules of the House and is done only by unanimous consent. There is absolutely nothing unusual about undertaking to bind conferees, especially when it is known that the individual opinions of the conferees are perhaps not what a majority of the House thinks about the given subject, and it is no reflection upon the conferees to take that sort of a position.

What is the unusual part of this procedure? The unusual thing is that the Appropriations Committee brought to the House in the beginning an appropriation bill with $225,000,000 in it more than the Budget and the President had recommended. That was defeated in the House. The Senate then added that amount to the bill over and above the Budget estimates.

These gentlemen say that never before has objection been made to sending an agricultural bill to conference. Perhaps not. Never before has there been such an agricultural bill, never before has there been such a procedure, and never before in my 16 years of service has the Appropriations Committee of the House undertaken to raise Budget estimates $225,000,000 over the specific protest of the President of the United States

If you are interested in agriculture and the farmer, certainly no one here and certainly none of my colleagues on this side will say that the President is not interested in agriculture. Certainly you will not say that President Roosevelt is not interested in trying to help agriculture. He has specifically withheld his approval of parity payments. When the President signed the agricultural bill of 1938, he did so with the statement that if it were sought to make parity payments, then the funds should be raised by taxes. Since the bill passed the Senate, the President and the Secretary of the Treasury have protested against the action of the Congress in raising the bill by this terrific amount above the Budget estimates.

Now, what is the parliamentary situation? The parliamentary situation is that you will have only one opportunity to express yourselves on this matter, and that is on the vote on ordering the previous question on the rule. Mind you, this rule not only sends the bill to conference but takes away the right of the House to instruct its conferees. I do not object to that. I have never been of the temperament that objected to "gag" rules. Listen! This House can always do what a majority of the Members of the House want to do. That is fundamentally true under our rules. There is never any situation here where a majority of the Members of the House cannot do what they want to do. If a majority of the Members of the House want these excessive increases made in the agricultural bill without having a right to vote upon them individually, you can do that today by voting down the previous question. But remember, if the previous question is voted down and the bill is sent to conference under this rule, then just as surely as the sun rises and sets the House conferees will agree to these parity payments in conference. I do not say this as a reflection upon those gentlemen. They certainly have a right to their opinion upon this matter and I respect their opinion; I do not share their opinion, but I respect it, but they are committed to this. They brought the bill in here over the protest of the Budget. It was defeated on the floor. It was put on in the Senate, and I do not see how it would be humanly possible for these gentlemen to maintain the position they have taken before the country unless they are for these parity payments.

So what will happen? They will agree to this conference and you will have one vote, either for the agricultural appropriation bill or against it, and you know what that means.

Of course, the bill should go to conference. There are over 100 amendments in it. The amount carried in the bill has been increased. It was already the largest appropriation in the history of the Government, $335,000,000, and they added $330,000,000 over the Budget estimate. If this bill passes the Congress and the President signs it, there is no use for anybody to get up in this House or anywhere else and talk about economy or trying to balance the Budget or trying to have any sort of sane, sensible budgetary control of Federal finances. This is the whole issue.

There is $500,000,000 in here for the farmers for benefit payments under the Soil Conservation Act, $25,000,000 for farm tenancy that the President recommended; $835,000,000 altogether that the President recommended, but the President has not recommended these increases and since it passed the Senate he has specifically placed his disapproval upon them.

Now, I ask you only that you make it possible for this House to vote individually on whether or not it wishes to agree to these large increases.

If the previous question is voted down, a motion will be made to amend the rule, sending the bill to conference, giving the conferees the right to negotiate with the Senate on all of these other amendments, but asking them merely to bring back these three amendments—parity payments, $225,000,000; surplus crop disposal, $113,000,000; and farm tenancy, $25,000,000—in order that the House, after consideration, may say whether or not it wishes to accept them,

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PACE. The gentleman has stated the enormous amount in this bill, when the facts are that when the items for agriculture in the last Congress are added and compared with those in this bill, it carries less than was appropriated at the last session of the Congress. The parity provision was carried in the relief bill and not in an appropriation bill. Does the gentleman agree with that statement?

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, in order that there may be no misunderstanding, if the gentleman from Georgia means that the total amount is below the amount appropriated in 1939, I will say to the gentleman that the bill is $258,-000,000 over the 1939 appropriation act for agriculture.

Mr. PACE. If the gentleman will yield, the figures are in the Record showing that all of the items appropriated by the last Congress for the farming interests are less than what are carried in this bill, including the other items appropriated for.

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the items he is referring to have been specifically objected to by the President of the United States?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. The item of parity payments was not approved by the President in a Budget estimate, and since the bill passed the Senate, in a press conference the President and the Secretary of the Treasury expressed their disapproval of the item.

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. In the event we vote down the previous question and the rule is amended, do I understand there are to be some hearings on these additional appropriations?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. No; the bill will go to conference, and the conferees will have to come back to the House for separate votes on these three amendments before they can be agreed to in conference.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I may be wrong about this, but who knows more about the conditions and the necessities of their respective districts throughout the United States, the Congressmen who represent those districts, the President of the United States, the Director of the Budget, or the Secretary of Agriculture? I would like to have the gentleman's opinion upon that.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman can answer that as well as I can, but I say to the gentleman that if we are going to have any sort of sensible and logical budgetary control of our finances, we must have some criterion or yardstick; and Congress has set up in the law the Budget and the recommendations of the President, and I think they should have some sort of standing in the

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he desires to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK].

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I have been amazed and chagrined to see some of our Republican leaders lead the fight against sending this farm bill to conference. The Republican Party evidently has made up its mind that it does not need the support of the Farm Belt. This bill does not do the job of bringing to our farmers anywhere near the measure of relief that is necessary to maintain farm homes, but it at least provides $225,000,000 parity payments, which was written in there by the Senate since this House acted upon the bill. Is there a Member of this Congress who can conscientiously say we are going too far when we provide a part of the losses which the farmers suffer annually because of the disparity between farm prices and other commodities?

No; this angle is not touched. The objectors say that this question on the floor is merely a question of procedure. They are more interested in procedure and the integrity of the House than they are in the plight of the farmers. I have always held the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Dirksen] in the very highest esteem, but when he says we must preserve the integrity of the House at all cost, no matter what condition the farmer is in, I am not only amazed but completely disappointed. When the gentleman from New York [Mr. Taber] voiced his opposition to sending this bill to conference, I was not surprised, because his philosophy as demonstrated in this House has always been to keep down expenses when it comes to agricultural questions.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Woodrum], a Democrat, can always be depended upon to follow the leadership of the reactionary Republicans, and today he reechoed the arguments of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Taber] and opposed this measure with not only Democratic time of the House but with 5 additional minutes granted by the Republicans.

All of these gentlemen, who seem to wring their hands and weep over large appropriations, voted for appropriation bills providing two and one-fourth billion dollars for the national defense at a time when we are at peace with all nations and could not possibly get into war unless we insisted on it. Has anyone in the House ever heard either of the gentlemen ever offer opposition to any bill providing relief to big business? Never. But when relief for labor, relief for agriculture come up, they all embrace each other, regardless of party, and vote with a common, united front against the classes of our citizens who are actually in distress. The foreclosure of 2,000,000 farm homes during this depression, the foreclosure of 1,500,000 city homes in the last 3 years, does not seem to appeal to them. On these questions they are determined to preserve the procedure of the House and the integrity of the House. Philosophy of this sort, if long enough indulged in, can only lead to the destruction of the Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. Coffee].

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, in the 2 minutes allotted to me I want to call to the attention of the Members of the House and of the conferees, whoever they may be, the restriction in the Senate amendment providing for parity payments. Under this amendment, parity payments to corn producers will be restricted to those in the commercial corn-producing areas only. In other words, it will restrict payments to the commercial areas in 586 counties in 12 States. There is nothing in the substantive law of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 which would restrict these payments to corn producers in the commercial areas only. Parity payments are authorized under the provisions of section 303 of that act. The language in parentheses in the Senate amendment "in the commercial corn-producing area" should be eliminated. Corn loans under the law permit those not in the commercial area to borrow only 75 percent as much as those in the commercial area. As a consequence last year corn producers in the favored commercial areas were able to borrow 57 cents per bushel, and those outside of the commercial area could only borrow 43 cents per bushel. Unless the restrictive language in the Senate amendment is eliminated, parity payments on corn will be confined to those who can now borrow 57 cents per bushel on their corn, and those who can only borrow 43 cents per bushel on their corn will be denied any parity payments whatever.

In 1938 there were 42,815,500 acres of corn in the commercial corn-producing area. The noncommercial area harvested 49,330,500 acres of corn. The total production of corn in the commercial corn-producing area in 1938 was 1,553,713,000 bushels, and in the noncommercial area it totaled 1,012,508,000.

I hope the conferees will eliminate the discriminatory language in the Senate parity payment amendment and make it conform to the amendment on which we voted in the House and which I supported.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Pace.]

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, I made a statement a moment ago and I want to confirm it.

On page 5493 of the Congressional Record is an itemized statement of the appropriations of the last Congress for the farmers, including $200,000,000 for roads, which they charge to the farmers; $1,529,000,000 was appropriated at the last session for this year. The present appropriation for next year is $1,387,000,000. The statement was made here just now that this was an enormous, unprecedented amount, when it is $142,000,000 less than was appropriated by the last Congress, and includes enormous items which are not fairly chargeable to the farmer. [Applause.]

Here is the summary, prepared by the finance officer of the Department of Agriculture, and placed in the Congres-Sional Record on May 12 by Senator Russell, of Georgia:

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Taber].

'The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DEMPSEY). The gentleman from New York, is recognized for 7 minutes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I have in my district a preponderance of agriculture. I am as much interested in the welfare of the American farmer as any man in America. I have opposed large appropriations of funds for almost every purpose. I have voted against large appropriations for the Army and for the Navy. I have voted against what I believed to be unconscionable appropriations for the W. P. A. I have found, as I have followed the situation from day to day in this House, that the more money we appropriate the more distress we create in America. The only possible salvation for the people of America is for this Congress to wake up and to realize that we cannot go on with a spending program without bringing greater and greater distress to the farmer and to those who are in industry. [Applause.]

Now, the idea with reference to this is not hostile to the farmer, but the idea with reference to this is to try to keep things within reasonable bounds. As this bill passed the House it carried $70,000,000 more for soil-conservation payments than will be made by the Department of Agriculture this year. Unless we begin now to realize our responsibilities to the people, we are leaving the people of this country in worse shape than we found them when the Congress met in January.

Now, it is not an unusual thing to ask a committee of conference to agree to bring back for a separate vote certain amendments. I have served on at least a dozen conferences since I have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations where the conferees agreed to bring back certain provisions for a separate vote. There is no such thing as putting this up on a farm measure first. It is the regular procedure that has been followed for years and years, one that is followed where a large number in the House feel that they should have an opportunity to vote. The question here presented is this: If we vote down the previous question, then we vote to give the Members of the House a fair opportunity to vote on each of these amendments. If we do not vote down the previous question, then we tell the membership of the House that they cannot have an opportunity to vote separately upon the three amendments that are in this bill that have been put in by the Senate, totaling $360,000,000.

Is it not time that we should begin to economize? I am not asking to begin on the farmer. I have spoken here in the Well on many occasions, asking this House to economize. I shall, just so long as I can, continue to ask the House to vote intelligently and fairly to the people of the United States on these measures.

I hope that the membership will realize their responsibility and will vote down the previous question when it is reached, so that we can have a square opportunity to vote on each of these amendments by themselves, square-toed.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. As I understand it, after this debate is concluded, the matter will come before us for a vote on the previous question. Then, if the previous question is voted down, someone will move to amend this resolution?

Mr. TABER. So that we may have a separate vote on each amendment—each of the three amendments.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The purpose, then, will be to give the conferees authority to go back to conference and dispose of the small amendments that are not in controversy and that the House has never acted upon before?

Mr. TABER. If the Senate will yield on the three large ones so that they can dispose of the whole thing.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes; and if the Senate does not yield on the three large ones, then the conferees will be instructed that they must bring these matters back to us.

Mr. TABER. That is right.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. For purposes of clarification, is it not a fact that a vote against this rule means a vote against parity? Is not the farmer entitled to this parity appropriation, when every other line of industry, labor, and all major groups have already been subsidized or had millions appropriated for them by this or previous Congresses? [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. It is not because there would be a separate vote and an opportunity to vote squarely on the parity question. If you vote against the previous question it is a vote against a combination of the items that many of us want an opportunity to vote on separately.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I still think I am right.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. As a matter of fact, unless this rule is amended we shall have no choice except to take everything or leave everything.

Mr. TABER. That is just the situation. The question is whether or not you want a fair opportunity to vote on each of these three large amendments.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. And if we vote for the previous question, and then vote for the rule and it is brought in, we put a vote of approval on the passage of these amendments as specified in the rules.

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will vote down the motion to order the previous question.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cannon].

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, this is the most remarkable rule reported by the Committee on Rules during this Congress—remarkable because it does not change in one iota the custom of the House—because it does not deviate by the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t" the procedure the House customarily follows under such circumstances.

Ordinarily special orders are reported from the Committee on Rules for the purpose of varying procedure, for the purpose of setting aside the routine of the House, but this resolution is submitted merely to prevent an objection raised by a Member from displacing the routine of the House and disorganizing the procedure usually followed in sending a bill to conference. So, in voting for this rule you are voting to do what the House has always done, and in the way that the House has always handled it.

It is extraordinary in another respect in that it has driven back under the sheltering arms of the President my distinguished friend from Virginia, who consistently, emphatically and implacably has been challenging the recommendations of the President on W. P. A. and work-relief unemployment. Here this afternoon he appeals to us to follow the President and repeatedly reiterates his devotion to the Presidential admonition. We are glad to see the lost lamb coming back to the administration fold. However, I must remind you that neither the President nor the Secretary of Agriculture are opposed to parity payments. What they have insisted on is that revenue be provided by Congress for the purpose and when this subject was last before the House, I inserted in the Record a letter from the President approving parity payments.

Mr. Speaker, if this resolution were voted down where would it leave us? We would be in the same position as if we had adopted the resolution.

The Senate has put this amendment in the bill, and they insist that it stay in the bill. This resolution insists that the amendments be rejected. If this resolution should be defeated and the bill comes back from the committee, you will find yourself just where we are now. All you can do if this resolution is defeated and the bill comes back will be to vote to disagree. This resolution votes to disagree. So, if you vote this resolution down and go through the entire, detailed, circuitous performance, you come right back to where you started, and you will then be just where you are now, and you will still have to go over and deal with the Senate just as this resolution proposes that you now go over and deal with the Senate. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the results to be secured by defeat of this resolution are so inconsequential as to lead to the conclusion that there must be something else back of this extraordinary opposition to the usual method of sending a bill to conference.

What extraordinary consideration prevails upon the gentleman from New York to raise an objection when he has not made such an objection in any session of Congress to any other appropriation bill? Why should this particular bill be selected for the objection? The only explanation of the purpose of the objection is the character of the amendments cited by the gentleman. He mentions three amendments, the amendment appropriating money for parity payments, the amendment providing funds for surplus commodity purchases, and the amendment for the relief of farm tenancy. There are more than 150 Senate amendments to the bill. But the gentleman singles out amendments which raise the price of farm products. He picks three amendments designed to carry out the pledges of both political parties in their national conventions. He selects three amendments redeeming commitments legislatively made to the farmers of the country by act of Congress. The inevitable conclusion, the only tenable explanation is that the purpose of the objection is to nullify the program to give the farmer his share of the national income and to make the present disproportionate return to agriculture, labor, and industry the permanent agricultural policy of the United States

Unless some other explanation can be given by those who object to this bill going to conference in its present status, the line seems to be drawn between those who favor increased prices for farm products and those who wish the farmer to continue to feed and clothe the world at less than the cost of production.

AMENDMENT OF SECOND LIBERTY BOND ACT, AS AMENDED

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 200 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution as follows:

House Resolution 200

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of H. R. 5748, a bill to amend the Second Liberty Loan Act, as amended. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Fish].

Mr. Speaker, this rule provides for the consideration of the bill, H. R. 5748, to amend the Second Liberty Bond Act. All it aims to do and will do is eliminate certain restrictions on bond issues. It does not in any way increase or authorize an increase in the indebtedness of the Government.

The purpose of this bill, and it has the unanimous support of the committee, is to provide greater flexibility in the management of the public debt. Under the present law, as amended, the limit of the public-debt obligation is $45,000,000,000, subject, however, to a limitation in the amount of bonds which may be outstanding at one time, namely, $30,000,000,000.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. May I say to the membership, that if the Members will pay close attention to the gentleman who is now addressing the House, it will materially speed up the program for the day. The question the gentleman is now discussing is one about which there is no controversy; however, the committee reporting the bill felt that it ought to come in and make an explanation to the House. This is a measure which the House has heretofore passed upon by unanimous consent.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, my object in rising at this time is to familiarize the Members with the provisions of this bill, because many Members have asked whether the bill would increase or authorize an increase in the national debt of the United States. As I stated previously, the limit is now $45,000,000,000 and only $30,000,000,000 may be issued in bonds.

At this time we have outstanding nearly $24,000,000,000 in bonds, permitting only an approximate $1,000,000,000 that can be issued. In addition to that we have $9,000,000,000 outstanding in short-term notes and this bill, as I have stated and repeat, will permit the issuance of an additional $15,000,000,000 worth of bonds, part of which can be used to take up short-term notes, although I hope this will not be necessary.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield.

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Will the gentleman explain to the House what he means by short-term bonds as distinguished from long-time obligations?

Mr. SABATH. I said short-term notes.

Mr. REES of Kansas. What is meant by "short term"?

Mr. SABATH. Oh, 90 days or so.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Is it 1 month, a year, 5 years, or what?

Mr. SABATH. Ninety days, 6 months, sometimes 1 year, even as long as 2 years.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

LXXXIV—380

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PATMAN. Is it not a fact that the Government on short-term obligations today is only paying about 11 cents for the use of $100 for 1 year?

Mr. SABATH. That is true, and according to the last report I noted in the newspapers it is only about 5 cents on $100, the cheapest rate of interest in the history of America.

Mr. REES of Kansas. In view of that statement, is it not a fact that the Government can borrow money cheaper on short-term notes than on long-time obligations?

Mr. SABATH. I believe it can and does obtain money at a much lower rate of interest on the short-term obligations, but we have now approximately $9,000,000,000 worth of these short-term obligations outstanding, and I feel that the Secretary of the Treasury, who recommends this legislation, has a good reason for it. With the confidence I have in him I know he will not issue any long-term bonds unless it is absolutely necessary, as his aim has been to obtain money for the Government at the lowest possible rate of interest. I have heard it said by many well-informed economists and even bankers that he has, to put it tersely, accomplished wonders. I remember there was a great fear in the minds of some Americans as to how we would finance the payment of the soldiers' bonus, and then the financing of W. P. A. and other agencies, but it was accomplished at the lowest rate of interest in the history of our Government.

Indeed, it is a great achievement, but we never hear of that. All we hear is criticism and fault-finding. The great record of the Secretary of the Treasury, instead of being attacked, should be heartily commended. He is entitled to the thanks of the Nation for his achievements. I feel that a unanimous vote should be had on the resolution and on the bill, which in effect would be a vote of confidence-

Were it not for the confidence I have in the Secretary and the administration I would be tempted to introduce an amendment to the bill providing that no tax-exempt bonds be issued under the power of this bill. As it is I feel sure that only in extreme necessity will that power be utilized in issuing such bonds, and before too long a time passes I hope that legislation will be enacted that will make possible the withdrawal of tax-exempt bonds now outstanding. Of course that cannot be done until the same thing is done with State and municipal securities and bonds.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.
Mr. WADSWORTH. As I understand, this bill will authorize the issuance of long-term bonds in excess of $30,000,000,000. This excess takes the place, as it were, of an equivalent amount of short-term notes?

Mr. SABATH. If necessary.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the long-term bonds be taxexempt as contrasted with non-tax-exempt notes?

Mr. SABATH. That is the point I have just now made. I have always believed we should not issue additional tax-exempt bonds, but in view of the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury and having in mind his splendid record and his achievements I am willing to trust him to carry on as he has the last 6 years, believing that he is familiar with the situation and desires to do what is best for the country and its credit and for the taxpayers of the Nation.

I know the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means is eager to explain the bill more fully, so I shall conclude by asking for as near unanimous support for the resolution as possibly can be had, especially in view of the fact that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Fish], who likes to oppose anything in which the administration is interested, is going to take the floor in opposition to the rule after I have concluded.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there is any opposition to this proposal on the minority side. This is merely permissive legislation to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to lift the limit now set at $30,000,000,000 for bond issues and issue them up, if he so desires, to the national debt limit of $45,000,000,000. As it is today, the Secretary can float bond issues only up to $30,000,000,000 and he has already issued $29,000,000,000 of bonds. The rest of the obligations are in short-term notes and certificates.

This is really a matter of procedure, but, encouraged by the chairman of the Rules Committee, my good friend, Mr. Sabath, who desires that I make some remarks about the administration and their financial capacity, about the Budget, and particularly about the national debt and taxation, I believe in 15 minutes or a half hour I can cover at least some of these subjects.

The President of the United States the other day issued a direct challenge to the American people, to the businessmen, and to the Congress. He wanted to know why it was that idle capital and idle wealth in the banks in the big cities of America could not join up with idle manpower and with idle wage earners. This challenge was submitted by the President, I assume, primarily to the Members of Congress and to the businessmen. I happen to be a businessman and for the time being a Member of Congress, and therefore I accept that challenge without any reservations whatever and will take some of my time under the rule to answer as to why it is that all this idle capital and idle wealth cannot get together with idle manpower in the United States to promote prosperity, turn the wheels of industry, and get our people back to work.

It must be self-evident that there is one main reason, and that answer is fear; fear pervades the land. Back in 1933 the President said in his inaugural address:

All we have to fear is fear itself.

That is exactly the trouble with the country today. There is nothing wrong with the United States of America. We have the same resources and the same manpower we had back in 1929. The only trouble is that there is fear all over the country, not only in the North and the West but in the South as well.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PATMAN. Is it not a fact that the people have complete confidence in their Government when they are willing to let the Government have money for one-twentieth of 1 percent interest?

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does not that show the people are afraid to invest their money in any other enterprise except Government bonds?

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SIROVICH. Is there not also fear in the hearts of the gentleman and the Republican Party that the President is likely to run for a third term?

Mr. KNUTSON. No; we hope he will.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman has asked me a question and I will be glad to answer it. It really is not included in the remarks I had expected to make. I believe, honestly and sincerely, that the easiest man for the Republicans to defeat on a third-term issue and the record of economic fallures he has made, unless there is a war, is Franklin Delano Roosevelt, and I am for your nominating him in order to find this out. [Applause.]

Now let me proceed, and perhaps discuss the gentleman whose name has just been mentioned, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

What is the trouble? I use the words of President Roosevelt just before his first election. Out of his own mouth he shall be judged. This is what he had to say back in 1932 when speaking on the very subject we are now discussing, that of deficits and debts:

I regard reduction in Federal spending as one of the most important issues in this campaign. In my opinion it is the most direct and effective contribution that government can make to business.

If that were true 7 years ago, it is doubly and trebly true today. Then he goes on to say this:

Our Federal extravagance and improvidence bears a double evil; our whole people and our business cannot carry on its excessive burdens of taxation; second, our credit structure is impaired by the unorthodox Federal financing made necessary by the unprecedented magnitude of these deficits.

If anyone, my friend from New York [Mr. Sirovich], or anyone else, would ask me what is the reason for this fear that pervades the land, I would say there are three reasons. There are probably many more reasons, but there are three important reasons.

First, I would say there was fear because of lack of confidence. Second, I would say there was fear because of the deficits. Third, I would say there was fear because of Roosevelt. Putting it in other words, I would say the three reasons could be expressed like this: Substitute the word "fear" for "Franklin," "deficits" for "Delano," and leave Roosevelt, and you have the complete answer. [Applause.]

Business seems to be a little bit worried when the President says we planned it that way, and why not when we have 12,000,000 unemployed, a $40,000,000,000 national debt, and an interest payment of $1,000,000,000—mark that—

$1,000,000,000 and more, annually.

Back in 1916—and there are some Members of the House who were serving here at that time—the total appropriation of the Congress was $1,000,000,000 and the total national debt was $1,000,000,000, while today the interest payment alone is $1,000,000,000, and I submit that we were a much richer country and a much wealthier people back in 1916 than we are today with a national debt of $40,000,000,000.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FISH. Certainly.

Mr. PATMAN. The per capita national debt on January 1, 1938, was less than it was after the war, and when there was an effort made after 1920 to reduce the debt, many people in this country objected to it being reduced quicker or being reduced very much because insurance companies and banks and trust companies wanted to invest their funds in Government bonds.

Mr. FISH. I do not agree that it is less than after the World War.

Mr. PATMAN. Per capita.

Mr. FISH. I do not agree that it is less per capita. It is now about $300, and I do not believe it ever got up to that amount even after the war, but what the gentleman means is that in 1 year, to win the war, we appropriated $27,000,000,000, and naturally immediately after that there was a big national debt, and the following year we appropriated $18,000,000,000 and thereafter it got up pretty high, but not as high as it is today.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes; I yield to the chairman of the Republican Committee on Taxation.

Mr. REED of New York. I simply want to say that at the close of the World War, or in other words, at the close of the Wilson administration, the per capita Federal debt was $200 and for 12 years the per capita debt was reduced until the present party came into power, and every year since they have been in power the per capita debt has increased.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman is quite right. The national debt after the war got up to $26,000,000,000 and under Republican administrations it was reduced to $16,000,000,000, and then it went back to $20,000,000,000 just before 1932, and now, of course, it is up to $40,000,000,000.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. In 1932, at the time that President Roosevelt complained about excessive Government expenditures, and promised a reduction in Government expenditures of 25 percent, the annual expenditures of the Federal Government were less than four and a half billion dollars. Instead of reducing expenditures of Government 25 percent, President Roosevelt and his New Deal tribe increased them 100 percent. It will not be long, if the New Deal continues its spending spree, before the American dollar and American Government bonds will be as worthless as the Camco slot-machine stock or the German marks, which President Franklin D. Roosevelt bought and sold prior to the time he entered the White House.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman is quite correct in that the President has repudiated practically every promise he made to the American people.

Yesterday, he made another promise when he virtually said, "My program is more spending, more taxes, and more debt." That is apparently the Democratic campaign slogan for 1940. I believe on this side of the House we will accept the issue and will fight against any such program of more spending, more taxes, and more debts. That is literally what the President said last night in his speech.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. FISH. Does not the gentleman agree with that?

Mr. DOUGHTON. No; I do not agree with that at all or anything like that. You quote what he did say and see if it represents that at all.

Mr. FISH. I just read it-more spending, more deficit spending, and more debts-did he not say that?

Mr. DOUGHTON. No; he did not say a word of it, and I challenge that statement and ask the gentleman to produce what he did say.

Mr. FISH. I read his speech and my memory is still good. Mr. DOUGHTON. That is your interpretation, but it is not what he said at all.

Mr. FISH. I am quite confident it is what he said.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. Just for the information of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], I would like to call his attention to the fact that at the close of the war the per capita national debt was $216; today it is $307. If the gentleman from Texas can get any satisfaction out of that situation, he is welcome.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I vield.

Mr. KITCHENS. Some gentlemen claim that we have only a 59-cent dollar, and that we owe $40,000,000,000. If that is true, we really owe 59 percent of $40,000,000,000, which would be about twenty-odd billion dollars. Does not the gentleman think that would be a fair way to figure it? [Laughter.]

Mr. FISH. Well, that is higher mathematics, with which I am not conversant.

There is plenty of money in the banks, billions of money in the banks. Business, if given the chance, would like to invest and would if they had any confidence whatever, but they are afraid. They are fearful that if they invest they will not be able to make any profits, and if they do make any profits that they will be taken away from them by punitive laws and punitive taxation. The result is that as long as this fear exists there will be no way of getting this idle capital and wealth together with idle manpower. Unless confidence is restored and fear done away with, we will be at a standstill with more and more unemployment all the time. The President wants to know the answer. He wants to know why business fears him. Let me see if I can put it in the terms of an old melodramatic story. It was called the "Perils of Pauline."

The villain tied poor helpless Pauline down on the bed and set fire to the bed. Miraculously, however, she escaped. Then again he lashed her to the railroad tracks, and again she miraculously escaped. Once again he met her and threw her off the cliff, but she fell in a tree and was miraculously saved. A few days later the villain met the heroine Pauline and he said to her, "Pauline, why is it that you try to avoid me? Why is it you are afraid of me?" [Laughter.] The President is repeatedly holding out the olive branch to business and wondering why there is no confidence when in the next breath he abuses and vilifies businessmen and opposes modification of any of the punitive statutes; he is against modification of the Wagner Labor Relations Act, the capitalgains tax, and the undistributed-profits tax, and he is against doing anything to encourage business or to dissipate fear or to restore confidence.

That is the trouble with America today. It is nothing but fear. Until that is done away with, either by Congress or by the President himself, these unfortunate and deplorable conditions will continue with 12,000,000 Americans unemployed in the greatest and richest nation in the world after 6 years of the New Deal experiments.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. KITCHENS] called attention to the fact that we now have a 50-cent dollar and $40,000,000.000 of debt, and thought that possibly it would be a good idea, a practical thing to cut the dollar in two and thus reduce the debt. I wonder if it has occurred to the New Dealers that if they would reduce the dollar to 25 cents, they would cut the debt further in two, and again that if they would cut it down to 121/2 cents, they would cut the debt in two again and finally wipe out all of the debt, leaving the insurance companies and the savings banks to hold the bag.

Mr. FISH. I think that is what many of the new dealers have in mind. One gentleman asked what the rate of per capita taxation is at the present time, including national, State, and local taxation. It is $22.50 per capita-double that of 6 years ago. The per capita debt is around $300.

The real issue behind this bill is what this administration proposes to do about the $45,000,000,000 national debt limitation. That is not changed in this bill, but that is perhaps the greatest single issue before the Congress of the United States today. The President himself said about 3 months ago that our national debt would be at the end of next June $44,500,000,000. We in the Congress have repeatedly gone above the Budget estimates, so that it may be above $45,000,000,000. I submit there is not a member of this House who knows what our national debt is today, that there is not a Member of this House or any committee that knows whether we have exceeded that $45,000,000,000 or not, including appropriations and authorizations, or whether we will by the 30th of June of this year.

I have introduced, and I hope that the Committee on Rules will adopt it, a strictly nonpartisan resolution, and it reads in this way:

House Resolution 195

Resolved, That a committee of five Members be appointed by the Speaker to make a recapitulation and a complete survey of the authorizations and appropriations of the first session of the Seventy-sixth Congress, to ascertain whether or not the limitation on the national debt established by law at $45,000,000,000 has been exceeded.

Said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby empowered to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths to witnesses, to sit during the sessions of the House, to have such printing and binding done, and to employ such clerical and stenographic services as it may deem necessary.

All executive departments, agencies, and independent establishments are requested to cooperate with the committee hereby created by furnishing all information the committee may require in its investigation.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman certainly would not include an authorization as part of the public debt until the appropriations had actually been made and expended?

Mr. FISH. The public debt is not based on authorizations or appropriations. The public debt is computed only when they issue bonds, certificates, or short-time notes,

Mr. COCHRAN. The public debt is reflected in money spent. The fact that you make an authorization does not mean that you have made an appropriation or spent any money.

Mr. FISH. That is quite right.

Mr. COCHRAN. And until you make the appropriation and spend the money you are not increasing the expenditures of the Government.

Mr. FISH. That is correct.

Mr. COCHRAN. For instance, you may provide for a project that will take 10 years to complete, and while it is authorized to be completed, yet the money is appropriated only from year to year as construction work proceeds.

Mr. FISH. The so-called daily Treasury statement you read is not based either on authorizations or appropriations. That is based on bonds issued, short-term notes, and other certificates of indebtedness. So I am only interested in finding out what the appropriations will be as of June 30, this year, and what the authorizations will be. Suppose we have exceeded the $45,000,000,000, you cannot impeach the Congress of the United States; you cannot impeach the President if we have violated the law, because we do the appropriating. I want to find out exactly where we stand. I want a complete survey of our authorizations and appropriations. I think every Member is entitled to it.

We have adopted by law a debt limitation of $45,000,-000,000. I, for one, and I think most Members, are against raising that limit. If you once begin to raise that limit from 45 to 50 billion, there is no end. Next time they will come back and ask to raise it to 55 and 60, and so on, ad infinitum. What we should have is a complete survey of both authorizations and appropriations made in this session of Congress, so that we know precisely where we are. If we are exceeding that limit, we ought to know it and take some course either to cut down the appropriations, or other appropriate action. That is why I say this is a nonpartisan resolution. The committee is appointed by the Speaker. It is for the benefit of all Members, to find out where we stand and act accordingly.

I repeat, not a single Member can definitely state what our appropriations are today, what our authorizations are, or what they will be on June 30. We want to get these facts and determine our action in Congress on the facts and not on guess work.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN. How can anybody advise the gentleman now what our authorizations and appropriations are going to be on June 30? If the gentleman will go to the document room and secure every public and private law that has been passed in this Congress up to this moment, he can make a recapitulation of what we have authorized and likewise what we have appropriated.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman knows it takes a little time to get resolutions passed, in the first place. In the second place, after the committee is appointed, they will be working through June 30, so that they will have a complete recapitulation including June 30, and until the end of this session of Congress.

Of course, we can go to the library, but if the gentleman himself went there and worked for a week he might ascertain the facts. What we want is a committee with power to subpena and power to have stenographic help and clerks to do this work. If the gentleman wants to take a few weeks' time and look over every law and every authorization that has been passed, we could get the same answer,

Mr. COCHRAN. That is all you are asking for here.

Mr. FISH. That is all we are asking for, but nobody has it. Mr. COCHRAN. No Member of this House, nor the gentleman himself, can tell us now where he will stand on June 30. He changes every day.

Mr. FISH. Well, that is my privilege, but I am interested in knowing where the national debt stands on June 30 and when this session adjourns.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield. Mr. MAY. The gentleman is aware of the fact, is he not, that the United States Treasury issues every day a statement showing the amount of the public debt?

Mr. FISH. I referred to that already.

Mr. MAY. Why not get at it in that way?
Mr. FISH. I referred to that twice, and that means absolutely nothing as far as this is concerned. That has nothing to do with appropriations made by Congress. It has nothing to do with authorizations. That simply has to do with the Federal indebtedness computed on bond issues, short-term notes, and certificates of indebtedness.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. If you went down to the document room, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] suggests, you would not be able to get the correct figures, because the congressional appropriation bills do not include hundreds of millions of dollars handed to foreigndictator countries by the New Deal Export-Import Bank and the billions of dollars handed to foreign owners and speculators under the New Deal gold- and silver-steal legislation.

Mr. FISH. The contingent liabilities are not included. If the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cochran] would delegate himself to spend a week either in the Library or wherever it is necessary to get these figures, he would be rendering a service to the country; but there is no Member who can give up a week's time to get this information for himself. It might take more than a week. The purpose of this resolution is to have a committee, empowered with stenographic help and clerks, to get all the necessary data, either through subpena or otherwise.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman can go to the Committee on Appropriations and he can get from the clerks of that committee in 5 minutes the amount of money which that committee has appropriated up to this hour, in this session where the President has signed the bills. They can likewise give you the amounts carried in every appropriation bill that has passed this House, and it will only take 5 minutes to get it. Insofar as authorizations are concerned, go and get the public laws and see for yourself.

Mr. FISH. That is exactly the situation. When an authorization is passed it is expected that the Appropriations Committee will include that in its deficiency bill. That is the reason it is passed. If you have got to find every bill that has passed Congress carrying an authorization before it is in the deficiency bill, then it will take some time.

Mr. COCHRAN. For instance, let me show the gentleman where he is wrong. Every year we pass a River and Harbor Authorization Act. It may be 20 years or more before the engineers of the Army will carry out all the projects that have been authorized. Congress appropriates a certain amount every year, in a lump sum, for river and harbor improvements. The engineers of the Army select the projects which they feel should be taken care of at the moment, confining the projects to those previously authorized. But the fact that we passed a river and harbor bill the other day authorizing projects which will require a tremendous amount of money, does not mean that those projects will be taken care of in 1 year, 2 years, 5 years, or 10 years. Some of it may never be spent.

Mr. FISH. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the action of the House today. Suppose we add $300,000,000 to the Agriculture Department appropriation bill, and suppose we are within $200,000,000 of the $45,000,000,000 debt limitation. I do not know whether we are or whether we are not, nor does the gentleman. I want to get a complete summation of all these authorizations and appropriations, so that we will know where we are, and so that if we pass this appropriation we will be under the $45,000,000,000 limitation. or if we pass a Navy bill we will be within the debt limitation fixed by law.

Mr. COCHRAN. Let us assume that the debt now amounts to $44,800,000,000. We have not as yet passed the relief bill. If the figures did show, when we take up the relief bill for next year, that the public debt amounted to $44,800,000,000, would the gentleman be in favor of throwing the relief bill into the wastebasket?

Mr. FISH. I want to find out whether that is the purpose the gentleman has in mind in order to exceed the $45,000,-000,000. I am trying to keep it down. I want to get a direct vote on this by the House, if necessary; and if the Democrats want to take the responsibility, let them take it; they are in charge of the House.

Mr. COCHRAN. I will tell the gentleman this—that if we discover we have already spent $44,800,000,000, I will still vote for the relief bill, even if it carries the deficit over the $45,000,000,000.

Mr. FISH. Is the gentleman in favor of lifting the debt limit above $45,000,000,000?

Mr. COCHRAN. If I found the debt already amounted to $44,800,000,000, which is within $200,000,000 of the limit, in voting for the relief bill I would be voting for an expenditure that would increase the debt over $45,000,000,000.

Mr. FISH. Is the gentleman in favor of raising the debt limit over $45,000,000,000?

Mr. COCHRAN. I just told the gentleman what I would do. Mr. FISH. Is the gentleman speaking for his party?

Mr. COCHRAN. I should say I am not. I always speak for myself alone.

Mr. FISH. Is the gentleman speaking for the President?
Mr. COCHRAN. I certainly am not, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. FISH. Certainly I do not.

Mr. COCHRAN. Now let me ask if the gentleman is speaking for the President as the representative of the President's congressional district? The gentleman is the representative of the President's congressional district, is he not?

Mr. FISH. I am speaking for the people of my district; and that is more than the President can claim. [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN. I know, but the gentleman is not speaking for the President, he will never say he is and we know he is not, even though he represents the congressional district which is the legal residence of the President.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has consumed 30 minutes.

There was no objection.

THE LATE CHARLES BENNETT SMITH

Mr. SCHWERT. Mr. Speaker, having just received news of the death of the Honorable Charles Bennett Smith, who served for four terms as a Democratic Member of the House of Representatives, I desire to call this item to the attention of the Members of the Seventy-sixth Congress. Mr. Smith first ran for Congress in 1910, the district then being the thirty-sixth New York, and he won an election believed unequaled in the annals of congressional contests. He defeated the veteran encumbent, Col. De Alva Stanwood Alexander, by one vote. A bitter post-election battle was carried on for several weeks, Colonel Alexander finally conceding defeat. An unusual angle of the election was that Colonel Alexander carried the city portion of the district by more than 400 votes but lost the towns, which are usually Republican. Mr. Smith was reelected in 1912, 1914, and 1916, but was defeated by 34 votes in 1918 by the Honorable Clarence MacGregor, who is now a supreme court justice.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. Smith served as chairman of the Committee on Patents. He was on the Tolls Committee that visited the Panama Canal and determined the tolls. A member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs which drew up the declaration of war, he came to know President Woodrow Wilson very well. One of the most dramatic conferences which Mr. Smith attended at the White House was that at which he heard President Wilson's report on the drafting of the League of Nations Covenant. Before entry of the United States into the World War, Mr. Smith consistently supported Mr. Wilson's efforts to keep the Nation from becoming involved. He also witnessed the vote that adopted the Prohibition Amendment.

His interests in Washington continued after his service in Congress. He was a stanch opponent of the St. Lawrence seaway development project and represented the city of Buffalo and the chamber of commerce in the capital combating ratification of the treaty. Mr. Smith served as chairman of the upstate Democratic campaign for the election of Gov. Alfred E. Smith as President. In 1934 he was appointed City Budget Director of the city of Buffalo by Mayor George J. Zimmerman, serving in that capacity until September 1, 1935, when he was apointed State superintendent of standards and purchase by Governor Lehman, the position he held at the time of his death last Sunday, May 21, 1939.

Early in Mr. Smith's life he was a telegraph operator, branching from that into the field of newspaper work, where he worked himself up to the position of managing editor of the Buffalo Times. He left the Times at the age of 28 and became managing editor of the Courier and the old Enquirer, keeping that position for 12 years—when he was elected to Congress.

During his life Mr. Smith became prominent in the affairs of his city, State, and Nation, and won much merit and praise in each and every position held by him. His death at the age of 68 is a severe loss to the State of New York, his death representing the loss of one of Buffalo's foremost contributors to the service of good government.

AMENDMENT OF SECOND LIBERTY BOND ACT AS AMENDED

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Patman].

ECONOMIC SYSTEM BASED ON DEBT

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the success of our economic system, whether we like it or not, depends upon debt—someone must go into debt. Comparing 1939 with 1929 we find that the total debt today is less than it was in 1929; that is, the total debts of this country owed by the people. As private business has been decreasing its debt, and as loans and discounts have decreased $20,000,000,000 from 1929 to 1936, someone had to spend money, because our system is based upon debt. It was therefore absolutely necessary that the Government go in debt. As the Government's debt has private debts decreased, or I should say as private debts decreased the Government debt necessarily increased.

The total private and Government debt today is $155,-000,000,000, whereas in 1929 it was $159,000,000,000. So our total debts have actually decreased.

GOVERNMENT DEBTS, PRIVATE LONG-TERM DEBTS, AND BANK LOANS AND DISCOUNTS, UNITED STATES, 1921-38

It is interesting to note that the grand total of the Government and private debts is at least five and one-half billion dollars less in 1938 than it was in 1929. The following table is self-explanatory:

If private business continues to fail to go into debt and do business as it should, the Government must continue to put money out, because money must be spent either by private business or by the Government. Let me tell you the difference in the cost of carrying this debt in 1929 as compared with now. In 1929 it cost us $6,222,000,000 a year to pay the interest on these enormous debts, whereas today the interest burden is only $5,419,000,000.

HOW INTEREST RATES HAVE REDUCED SINCE 1933

The private rate of interest has decreased considerably since 1933; so has the interest rate on long-term Government obligations. The following table is self-explanatory:

PRESIDENT WILSON WANTED PROFITS TAKEN OUT OF LAST WAR

Much has been said about the war debt and about the reduction of the debt under the 12 years of Republican administration. Permit me to invite your attention to the fact that in 1917 President Woodrow Wilson and a Democratic Congress were determined to take the profits out of war and passed tax bills which had they remained upon the statute books of this country would have entirely liquidated the national debt by 1927. When the Republicans came into power, however, in 1921 they said, "No; we do not want these heavy taxes paid; we do not want this debt liquidated quickly. We believe that a large national debt is a wholesome and constructive thing for the country." They openly argued that we needed Government bonds for insurance companies to invest in, for banks to invest in to carry their reserves, and for trust companies to invest in. They said, "Therefore, we need and must have a large Government debt." It could have been entirely paid through those years, but the Republicans preferred not to pay it.

President Wilson during the World War said that those who profited by the war should pay the cost of the war, and he persuaded the Congress to pass the tax laws I have mentioned which, if they had remained upon the statute books, would have caused the entire payment, the complete liquidation of the national debt, by June 30, 1927; but when the Republicans came into power March 4, 1921, they did not see fit to keep these war taxes in effect. They did not want to liquidate that national debt so quickly; in fact, many of them argued that a pretty good-sized national debt is a sound thing for the country and that we should have a pretty goodsized national debt.

WAR DEBT COULD HAVE BEEN PAID BY JUNE 30, 1927

In connection with the public debt I desire to invite your attention to a statement prepared by Mr. L. H. Parker, chief of staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxa-This statement discloses that if the Woodrow Wilson taxes had continued the national debt would have been entirely paid by June 30, 1927, and there would have been a surplus at that time in the Treasury after the payment of the debt of $1,542,000,000.

The statement I refer to is contained in volume 79, part 3, of the Congressional Record for the Seventy-fourth Congress, first session, page 2687, and is as follows:

Estimate of additional revenue that would have been derived under the income and excess-profits tax rates of the year 1918 continued in subsequent years, with effect upon the public debt by the application of such additional revenue thereto

Note.—It is assumed that business profits (net income) would not have been depressed by the high tax.

(This statement prepared by the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation. Mr. L. H. Parker, chief of staff.)

I was in Congress in 1929, when, at one time, $190,000,000 was given to the income-tax payers just as an absolute gift, as a subsidy, in order to prevent the payment of the national debt so quickly. Naturally, there was more money coming in under those tax laws than was being paid out. The above statement does not take into consideration the billions of dollars illegally refunded in income-tax payments. Now in regard to fear.

ARE PEOPLE AFRAID OF THEIR GOVERNMENT?

It is said the people are afraid of their Government; you hear that every day here on the floor of the House. Are the people afraid of this administration? Are they afraid of the President of the United States? Are they afraid of the Congress? Let us see. If people will put their money into this Government they are not afraid; and when people will hire their money to the Government, or let the Government have their money for one-twentieth of 1 percent interest, they certainly have confidence in this Government; and this is what the Government is now paying on short-term obligations and is the lowest rate of interest that has ever been paid by this Government in the history of the country. [Applause.] Incidentally, it is cheaper than printing money. It would cost much more than that to print it.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in the year 1929, in September, when the Republican Party, through its President, had promised two chickens in every pot and two automobiles in every garage, the value of all the stocks, bonds, and debentures of the public utilities alone was about $20,000,000,000; but when Herbert Hoover retired from the Presidency, these values had fallen to $1,756,000,000.

Mr. PATMAN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan. Mr. HOFFMAN. Was that because the people were afraid of what was coming?

Mr. PATMAN. They were afraid of what was happening. That is what they were afraid of. If the gentleman wants to compare 1932 under Mr. Hoover with 1939 under Mr. Roosevelt, I will yield the gentleman the remainder of my time. He is certainly not bragging about what happened in 1932.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I am thinking of what we have now. Mr. PATMAN. We had something pretty bad at that time. It was much worse then. If the gentleman will look at the Evening Star of last night and read the article written by Jay Franklin, which compares conditions in 1932 with 1939, citing official records which the gentleman cannot dispute or deny, I think he will be convinced without any effort on my part.

Mr. HOFFMAN. At least, we had a President then. Now you have a man down there who listens to John Lewis.

Mr. PATMAN. He did not shoot any World War veterans. Mr. HOFFMAN. No; he is starving them to death.

Mr. PATMAN. He did not shoot any World War veterans. but treated them kindly when they came to Washington. No one has starved during Mr. Roosevelt's time, while Mr. Hoover refused to feed the starving or assist the needy. He said it was unconstitutional and unorthodox.

Mr. MURRAY. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin. Mr. MURRAY. How much was corn worth in that same article?

Mr. PATMAN. I do not recall.

Mr. MURRAY. I do, sir.
Mr. PATMAN. I believe the gentleman will admit that the prices of commodities are much higher today than they were in 1932. I am sure he will not deny that.

Mr. HOFFMAN. How about cotton?

Mr. PATMAN. It is much higher.

Mr. HOFFMAN. It was 17 cents then. It is now about

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman has his figures mixed up. I will not say "as usual," but at least this time.

Mr. GEYER of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman from California. Mr. GEYER of California. I may say I will put those very figures in the RECORD this evening.

Mr. PATMAN. I thank the gentleman.

So, some one must go into debt and the best way to keep the Government out of debt is for private business to go into debt. Somebody must borrow money. Someone must spend, because the success of our economic system is based upon debt. If it is necessary for the Government to go into debt, we must continue to spend until private business comes back and goes into debt for itself. [Applause.]

AMENDMENT OF SECOND LIBERTY BOND ACT, AS AMENDED

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5748, to amend the Second Liberty Loan Act, as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5748, with Mr. GAVAGAN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15

Mr. Chairman, this bill, H. R. 5748, comes to you with a unanimous favorable report from the Committee on Ways and Means, so I take it there is no objection to the bill. It provides greater flexibility in financing the needs and requirements of the Government. Under the Second Liberty Loan Act, as amended, there is a limitation of $45,000,000,000 on the Government indebtedness that may be outstanding at any one time. This bill does not increase or change that amount, but leaves the law just as it is at present.

There is also a limitation of $30,000,000,000 in the present law on the amount of Government bonds that may be outstanding at one time, leaving $15,000,000,000 that may be outstanding in other forms of Government obligations. This bill has for its purpose the giving of greater latitude to the Secretary of the Treasury and providing more flexibility in financing the obligations of the Government authorized by the Congress. The bill gives him the power to finance these public obligations more efficiently and economically and leaves entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury the form in which he will issue the obligations of the Government. whether bonds, or Treasury notes, or certificates of indebtedness of any type he may deem desirable and which the condition of the money market at the time he refinances these obligations may indicate it will be most favorable to the Government for him to adopt.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Fish] is never happier than when he is criticizing the present administration and he never lets an opportunity pass to do so. He is always in his glory when an opportunity presents itself to take the floor and inveigh-and he does it quite eloquently as he is a good talker-against the policy of the administration. The gentleman from New York decided that the President's speech last night indicated he was in favor of higher taxes and bigger deficits and all that kind of thing, not a word of which I heard, and I listened to the President's speech very attentively. His speech speaks for itself; it is not necessary for me to make any explanation of it. and I am certain I would make no apology for the speech made by the President.

The gentleman from New York emphasizes at great length the matter of deficit financing and the large increase in the public debt under this administration, but I would remind the gentleman from New York and those whose views are similar to his that this administration and the Democratic Party have no monopoly on deficit financing. When this administration came into control of the affairs of this Government on March 4, 1933, we had been running a deficit for a number of years. We inherited not only the policy of deficit financing but an empty Treasury and an almost bankrupt country. Everyone knows that. During the last years of the previous administration the national income had dropped to approximately $40,000,000,000. You never hear that fact referred to by our Republican friends. national income had fallen to something like $40,000,000,-000. In 1937 the national income increased to $65,000,000,-000 and went down last year a little, although it still was $60,000,000,000 or above-$20,000,000,000 more than it was during the last years of the previous administration-and this year it will be about $65,000,000,000; $65,000,000,000 contrasted with $40,000,000,000 makes a difference, according to my arithmetic, of $25,000,000,000 between the national income this year and the national income of the last year of the Republican administration. This $25,000,000,000 increase in the national income in 1 year would more than pay off every dollar of the increase in the national debt over a period of 6 years.

Further, the amount of Government obligations outstanding on the 30th of April was thirty-nine billion and some hundreds of millions, leaving $5,000,000,000 of obligations that may yet be issued before the limit of $45,000,000,000 is I know that $39,000,000,000 or $40,000,000,000 or $45,000,000,000 looks large, and it is quite a large sum, but today we have in the Treasury of the United States-I have just phoned the Treasury to find out-a working balance as of May 20th of $2,329,307,554 in cash. We have this much cash that we could use tomorrow if we were balancing the books to pay on the public debt, whereas at the inception of President Roosevelt's administration there was not over $200,000,000 in the Treasury. The Treasury was practically empty. Yet we never get credit for that, and that is a comparison our friends never think of, let alone being willing to make.

Mr. Chairman, let us give credit where credit is due. We have paid off and added to the public debt the soldiers' bonus, for which the President was in no way responsible. Congress was responsible for that payment, which increased the public debt of the Nation more than $1,000,000,000. We are entitled to credit for that. We should charge that increase up to the Congress, not to the President of the United

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman can also add the $1,800,-000,000 in the stabilization fund to the $3,200,000,000 in the general fund.

Mr. DOUGHTON. They can twist that around and say that is sleight-of-hand business, but the gentleman is correct.

Again, Mr. Chairman, you will recall that not only did this administration inherit the greatest economic depression in all the history of this country but after it came into power we had 2 years of the most serious and disastrous drought ever known in our history. The present administration and the Democratic Party are not responsible for that. If anyone is responsible, it is Providence, not the Democratic Party.

We were compelled, as a matter of duty, of course, but not as a matter of law, to spend several hundred millions of dollars to relieve the distress of the suffering in the sections of the country in the West and Midwest. We are entitled to some credit for that. The previous administration had no such catastrophe and no such calamity to deal with.

Then, in addition, we are entitled to a further credit against this $39,000,000,000 for the money we have in good loans and recoverable assets. This represents money we have loaned through the R. F. C. and through farm organizations, principally to farmers, and also money loaned through the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and other various lending agencies of the Government, represented in good securities in the Treasury of the United States, good as gold, and will be collected and applied to the discharge of our national debt, and they amount to something like $5,000,000,000.

So, after all, Mr. Chairman, when you contrast the picture and get right down to the truth and state the facts, you can realize that this administration, although on the books the public debt is enormously increased, if you give it the credit to which it is entitled, the national debt is not so colossal as our Republican friends would have you believe.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from New York

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am very much interested in the reassuring statement of the gentleman from North Carolina and, indeed, his rosy picture of this situation, but I want to ask him a question for information. Reference was made a little while ago in this debate—

Mr. DOUGHTON. As great a premium as I put on the gentleman's intelligence, I do not believe he needs much information.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; I do.

Mr. DOUGHTON. But if I can give him any information, I shall be pleased to do it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Reference was made in the debate on the rule a short time ago to what might happen as we come within, we will say, $1,000,000,000 of the $45,000,000,000 limit of the national debt, and I would like to know whether it would be within the power of the President under existing law, in the event we found ourselves within $2,000,000,000 or $3,000,000,000 of the national debt limit, a part of which would be short-term notes, to retire those notes by the issuance of all or a part of the $3,000,000,000 which he may issue under the famous agricultural law of 1933. By issuing that currency, speaking of sleight of hand, could he retire two or three billion dollars of short-term notes and thus put the debt down to $42,000,000,000?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I regret that I do not feel able to give the gentleman the information, but I do feel that under the present law or under the Second Liberty Loan Bond Act, as amended, there is no authority vested in any governmental agency, the Secretary of the Treasury or anyone else to exceed or have in excess of $45,000,000,000, at any one time, of outstanding Government obligations.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman from North Carolina would not contend that the $3,000,000,000 of paper currency which the President may issue at any time is to be computed, if issued, as a part of the national debt.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I would not contend that. I would not contend anything that the law did not provide, and as I am not a lawyer, and I assume the gentleman from New York

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; I am not.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Well, there are able lawyers in the House-

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not even a member of the bar. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. And I respectfully submit that that matter should be submitted to the Department of Justice or the Committee on the Judiciary or some person that knows more law than I do.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. PATMAN. May I suggest to the gentleman that under the Agricultural Act of 1933 and the Thomas amendment, providing that $3,000,000,000 could be issued in so-called greenbacks, I believe the law is very plain, and the President could use that money to retire existing obligations.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the matter I would like to pursue further, because we must all realize we are approaching pretty steadily the $45,000,000,000 debt limit.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield further to my colleague and friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. Wadsworth].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Apparently, therefore, if the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] is correct, the President may reduce the national debt by $3,000,000,000 by simply issuing that amount of currency, paper money. I want to pursue that inquiry.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Oh, the President has never been accused of entertaining inflationary views.

Mr. WADSWORTH. For reducing the debt—that is true. Mr. DOUGHTON. But I say he believes in sound finance.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Perhaps the gentleman will inform me on this question; and I need the information, because I am not an authority on the Silver Purchase Act. I understand that the hoard of silver which we have accumulated under the Silver Purchase Act can be converted into currency in whole or in part.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman does not understand there is any intention to do that?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I understand that it would be legal to do it.

Mr. DOUGHTON. All things lawful may not be expedient.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask if the President has the power to do that by Executive order?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I could not tell the gentleman.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If so he could reduce the national debt on a paper basis several billion dollars.

Mr. PATMAN. And would the gentleman be in favor of the President doing that?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; I would not.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I have no fear that he will embark on any such program, knowing his reputation for sound finance.
Mr. WADSWORTH. His reputation for what?

Mr. DOUGHTON. For sound finance, as proven today by the way the Government bonds are selling, all above par, whereas when he came into power the Government bonds were selling at 80 or 81. Oh, the gentleman need not shake his head, because that is the fact, and that demonstrates that the people of the country have confidence in the President's financial policy.

Something has been said about the financial condition of the country, and if our friends of the minority wish to go before the country on that issue, no matter who is their candidate, or who is our candidate, and have a showdown on the records of the two administrations for the welfare of all of the people, for business, for industry, for the farmer, for labor, for those engaged in every walk or calling of life we will welcome it. They talk about Hoover's time when there were two cars in every garage and a chicken in every pot. If there were two cars in every garage, they were in there because the people could not afford to buy gasoline to operate them. My country was full of cars that had been converted into Hoovercarts, but I have not seen one around there in 3 or 4 years; and now as you go out into the streets and highways of this country you will see them filled with new, upto-date, modern automobiles. People must have money to purchase them, or, if they buy them on credit, they have money to buy gasoline and oil to run them. The theaters are filled with people, and the people must have money or they could not attend. Misery and distress existing under the Hoover administration has been supplanted in millions of cases by happiness and contentment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has again expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I had not supposed there was going to be much debate upon this bill, but I now have requests from several gentlemen on this side, and I think some of them have been actuated by the argument of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton]. For a man with as good common sense and ability as he has shown over a period of years in connection with his own finances, it seems strange to me to hear him defend the President's speech of last night. It was my privilege also to be in the audience, and I saw the gentleman from North Carolina there, dressed to perfection. He certainly got a very different impression from that speech than I did. I thought it was an exhibition of high finance on the part of the Democratic President, when the theme of his speech was practically more spending-let us keep spending, and the further we get into debt the richer we will be. That was about the argument made by the President. If I sense the ideas of the Members on this side of the House, they are all to the contrary. The day will come sometime when we will have to stop spending and when we will have to pay our indebtedness, and we certainly are not going to do it if we follow the advice of the President of the United States in his speech last night. Instead of spending, spending, spending as he recommends, the Republicans of this House and the people of the country believe in saving, saving, saving and paying, paying, paying-

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. No; I have not the time. That is the theme of the address last night, which the gentleman from North Carolina is defending on the floor today. Its theme is contrary to any intention on the part of the Republican minority, so far as the next election is concerned, and while there is no politics in this measure, and we did report it unanimously from the Committee on Ways and Means, I say that in addition to the reciprocal-trade agreements and certain other details that we are going to take up next year, we will be glad to meet opposition on the question of thrift, such as the gentleman from North Carolina has exhibited in his own behalf, but certainly not in behalf of the Treasury of the United States when he defends such a speech he heard made last night.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the reason this bill is here today is that the administration now fears getting beyond the $45,-000,000,000 limit that the law provides at the present time. We could not answer the Rules Committee yesterday as to why $45,000,000,000 was the original ceiling figure. It was an unthinkable indebtedness when it was voted into law-to think that this country would eventually get into an indebtedness of $45,000,000,000. Yet the majority side stand here today and defend that amount and fears the expectation of increasing the amount in the near future. That is the reason you are asked to change this ceiling. Of course, it is only a matter of manipulation as to the kind of investment that you have. So let us pass the bill, but we cannot pass over the statements made that we should continue this spending spree such as is being advocated here this afternoon.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the chairman of the com-

Mr. DOUGHTON. I know my friend always desires to be correct.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am correct this time, too, both as to what the gentleman said and what the President said last

Mr. DOUGHTON. I think the gentleman knows there is no possibility here of changing the ceiling.

Mr. TREADWAY. Well, you are going to change the ceiling in the near future.

Mr. DOUGHTON. But not in this bill. Mr. TREADWAY. Just as certain as gospel you are going to come in here and ask to change the ceiling. You are not doing it in this bill, but this is a forerunner of what you will be obliged to do, because you admit you are going to continue spending, and if you do, you will overreach the $45,000,000,000.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Was there any consideration given as to the reason why the limitation of $25,000,000,000 was originally put in here against the limitation put on the issuance of bonds, and why that was only raised $5,000,000,000 to $30,-000,000,000 in the limitation of bonds? Was there any consideration given in the Ways and Means Committee to that subject?

Mr. TREADWAY. I think those are just arbitrary figures. At the time those figures were made there was no expectation of reaching them.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I make this observation: That limitation on the bonded indebtedness of the United States was put on to prevent inflation. That is why we want to keep the ceiling on bonded indebtedness proportionately below the ceiling today, to prevent inflation, because this does raise the ceiling by about $11,000,000,000, and if I can get 5 minutes I will prove it.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am going to yield the gentleman 5 minutes in a very short time. I first agreed to yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. Horron].

Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. Horton].

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Chairman, the bill which we have before us today will pass. I do not rise in opposition to the bill so much as I do in protest against present policies, which not only make a bill of this kind necessary but which, if they are not stopped dead in their tracks, will shortly make similar action regarding the public debt mandatory.

One could be critical and put the blame for this stupendous increase in the public debt here or there, but that would not be helpful. I only know that we have this great debt and that it must not be permitted to increase.

The fact is that we have a public debt in excess of $40,000,-000,000 and that four and one-fourth billion dollars have been spent during the present fiscal year in excess of the receipts for the same period.

With a public debt increase during the past 6 years of more than $20,000,000,000, with A. F. of L. figures showing 10,000,000 men out of jobs and governmental figures indicating 21,000.000 individuals depending upon relief payments-many of them apparently content to remain so-it is high time that each of us asked of himself the question, "Why should these conditions exist, when we live in a country blessed with natural resources in excess of those of any other country and blessed with a home market for all of our products of every kind above the combined markets of all other countries?"

Something is radically wrong, and it is your job, Mr. Cotton Grower of the South, and your job, Mr. Industrialist of the North, and the job of the various representatives of the East and West, North and South, to solve this problem.

You know that I never knew before I came down here that there was an aisle in this Chamber which was supposed to separate the sheep from the goats, and, frankly, if we were all shuffled together, you could not pick out the goats from the sheep, and sometimes when we permit that aisle to separate us distinctly I think that we are all goats.

What I am trying to say is that we are all in the same boat and that we are rapidly approaching the rapids. There is no such thing as lasting prosperity for any single group, we all go up or we all come down together. There are industrial problems, farm and ranch problems, and labor problems. There is your way, my way, and the right way to solve these problems. But until we find that right way, we cannot anticipate a happy country.

What about this Federal debt of more than forty billions and what about all debts-private, State, municipal, business. and Federal—that approach the stupendous total of two hundred and fifty billions, one-fourth of a trillion dollars, if my memory for big words is correct. Not to pay your debts has, through all the ages, been nothing but fraud, but since the World War a new theory that nonpayment of debt is a possible way out seems to have prevailed in European countries, and even has raised its ugly head in this country.

Either it is going to be paid or we are going to follow the lead of Germany and repudiate all debts. But we will not stop there any more than Germany did. We will follow her lead to the bitter end. Thank God, we are not that kind of people, either as individuals or as a nation. All of this loose talk of drinking ourselves sober, spending ourselves rich, is but the dream of the opium pipe smoker, and again, thank Heaven, we wont follow that kind of leadership in this country: at least not very long.

All right then, we are going to pay our debts, and when we have definitely decided upon that course, the battle is already half won. I know that when I say that, I have the approval of most men in this House. But how? Of course, there is bound to be honest differences of opinion here. But here are my suggestions. Certainly we are going to remove fear from industry and reestablish confidence, and give business a chance to make an honest dollar by removing killing and stifling taxes.

Second. We are going to give the American market to American labor, American ranchers and farmers, and American industries.

Third. Certainly we are going to cut expenses of government to the bone.

Fourth. Increase national income? Well, yes; but if the three things that I have mentioned above do not increase the national income, then there will just not be any increase in the national income.

First. Taxes: It is not necessary for me to go into this question; not so long as we have such able men as dozens that I am looking at in this body and not so long as we have such men as Vice President Garner, Senator Harrison, Senator VANDENBERG, and Senator Taft in the other body. When you add to these Mr. Haynes, of the Treasury Department, you have a composite intelligence and group knowledge of sane taxes that I, for one-and I believe most every other man in this body-is willing to follow.

Second. Give the American market to American labor, farmer-rancher, and industries.

When I say this I do not mean lip service: I am deadly in earnest. Labor must be kept free and must in return for an honest day's labor receive an honest wage, which will permit of the continuation of the highest living standards on the face of the earth. To do this his jobs must not be given to South America nor to any other part of the world; neither must government encourage or permit the importation of goods from foreign countries with a lower price level and inferior living standards, except with a tariff that overcomes these differentials. The farmers and ranchers, for one thing, are entitled to produce the sugar requirement of this country. This is the greatest cash crop which the American farmer enjoys. Revise your sugar-allotment plan, and when you do that be sure that you word any agreement as to the share which producer and refiner is to receive in such a manner as to insure the producer his fair proportion. Be sure that reciprocal-trade agreements—and they are agreements, not treaties, because if they were treaties they would have to be confirmed by a two-thirds vote of the Senate, and that has not been done—I say, be sure that reciprocal-trade agreements are reciprocal; and if they are not reciprocal, repeal them and be sure that the farmers and ranchers are not paying heavily for any benefit the automobile or other industry is receiving. Give the American farmer the American market and he will never miss the parity payments which, after all, are but sugar-coated pills fed him as pacifiers while robbing him of the only thing that will correct his plight-namely, the American market.

It was stated recently before a Senate Appropriations Committee that if the yearly income of 9,000,000 American families could be increased substantially above the $1,500 which they are now receiving that they would use twice as much cotton, wheat, meat, woolen goods, and what not as they are

If this is true, and it was excepted as such by this committee, then not only would all surplus disappear but every man out of employment would have a job, and every industrial wheel would hum. Surely this "America for Americans" is the key that will cause the national debt to dissolve like snow in the sun.

Third. Cut expenses of Government. If we can regain the American market we will, as indicated above, have put every man to work—that means that all relief and semirelief agencies are out. Since we have spent fifteen and one-half billions for these purposes during the last 6 years, this means a saving of two and one-half billions a year. With men at work, on their own, and with their old fighting morale going strong, these terribly expensive, semisocialistic experiments. which are instilling in the minds of once free men the idea that the Government owes them a living, are likewise outand I hope forever.

If we are going to stop these huge Government expenses we are going to start at home, and that means in Wyoming just the same as it does in Mississippi and every other State. I know just how popular that will make each of us back home; but after all that is the only way to save America.

I got up about milking time this morning to try and collect my thoughts so as to present to you something that I thought might prove constructive.

I thought I was getting along fine. Just then a paper boy threw the Washington Post in my door, and here is what

New Deal won't yield on spending, taxes, or relief, says Roosevelt.

If that is the attitude of this administration, we had better ask ourselves whether we are mice or men. The responsibility is yours, Mr. Majority Leaders. I can only pledge you the support of every minority member in any sane program of tax revision and in any program of stopping wild, unnecessary spending that you will inaugurate.

The choice is yours-will you save America, or will you permit America to be dragged over the cliff to destruction?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Wolcott].

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, it is rather difficult for anyone to cover this subject in 5 minutes and to answer many of the general statements which have been made here today. I hope that this House will not take for granted the accuracy of the general statements made. I hope that this House will not pass this bill in its present form. I do not believe that there are 10 percent of the Members of this House who are in favor of inflation, yet I believe this bill is as inflationary as any bill which has ever been brought before this House for consideration.

The reason why the original limitation of $25,000,000,000 of Government bonds was put in the original act was to prevent inflation. The reason why it was only raised $5,000,-000,000 when it was last amended was to prevent inflation. Now we take the ceiling off entirely and we authorize the issuance of $45,000,000,000 of bonds.

The general axiom is this, that the danger of inflation from an increase in the volume of currency increases in the same proportion as the differential between long-term obligations and short-term indebtedness decreases within the legal limit of the aggregate. We are wiping out all legal differentials between short- and long-term obligations. I do not think the Ways and Means Committee has given adequate consideration to this bill, and if I am given opportunity, at the proper time I am going to ask that this bill be returned to the Ways and Means Committee for further consideration, after which I shall ask the indulgence of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee for a few of us who have given at least a little thought to the subject to appear before the committee and to express our views.

We have given the President of the United States, directly and indirectly, authority to issue about $11,000,000,000 in currency, which is not within the limitation provided in this act. If we raise the bonded indebtedness of this Nation to $45,000,000,000, every dollar of short-term indebtedness may be replaced by United States notes, silver certificates, Federal Reserve notes, or if we wanted to go back to the practice, we could issue Federal Reserve bank notes, all of which do not come within this limitation, but all are obligations of the Federal Government. I think this House has been lulled into a condition of lethargy by believing the statements this $45,000,000,000 does not raise the debt limitation. This raising of the authority to issue up to $45,000,-000,000 in long-term bonds of the Federal Government increases the debt limitation by the same amount that we have authorized the President to issue currency. [Applause.]

I think that we should not vote on this with the limited knowledge we have.

My first effort will be to try to amend this bill by raising the limitation $3,000,000,000. At the present time according to the report, and I assume that the Treasury gave the Ways and Means Committee the correct figures, the Treasury can still issue $1,697,026,819 and be within the limitation of $30,000,000,000. By raising this authorization to $33,-000,000,000 we shall give them a leeway of $4,697,026,819 which at least should be sufficient for the coming year. So, I have two proposals: The one is to introduce an amendment authorizing the increase in the authority to issue long-term obligations of the Government up to $33,000,000,000; that failing I expect, if I am given the opportunity, to move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means in order that more intelligent consideration may be given to the bill. I am very sincere in the statement that this bill is one of the most inflationary bills ever brought to the floor, and I think you should be very cautious in considering it.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does the gentleman think there is any constitutional question involved in this bill?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I may say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I have never posed as a constitutional lawyer. I have the satisfaction, however, of being able to tell the gentleman today that when I stood on this floor and contended that the reciprocal-tax bill was unconstitutional the Supreme Court later confirmed my position. It had to reverse itself to find me wrong.

Mr. McCORMACK. The Supreme Court did not find the gentleman's views to be correct.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

THE INCONSISTENCY AND THE ABSURDITY OF THE PRESIDENT'S POSITION

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, from the day he became a candidate down to the present moment, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, as candidate and President, has repeatedly expressed himself as deeply concerned with the welfare of those he chose to designate as the underprivileged, presumably meaning that fraction or one-third of our population which makes up the lowest income group.

His sympathy for those in this class is commendable, but he has no monopoly on sympathy, charitable impulses, earnest desire to help, although ofttimes he talks as though he had. Every true Christian American desires to aid those less fortunate than himself.

Again the President has correctly expressed the thought that this Government is maintained by a system of taxation and that taxes are paid in the sweat of the man who labors,

Every student of our Government, familiar with the history of our country and its present condition, knows that the tax money which is spent so lavishly by this administration is taken in the main from the wage earner—not from the rich nor from the great corporations.

The President was right when he said that taxes are paid in the sweat of the man who works and that, if taxes are excessive, unemployment will increase, breadlines will either lengthen or relief expenditures will mount.

Already this administration has piled up a debt that is appalling; but last night the President made this statement. Listen to it, please—consider it and weigh it:

Our national debt, after all, is an internal debt, owed not only by the Nation but to the Nation. If our children have to pay interest on it, they will pay that interest to themselves.

This statement would be true did our Nation consist of but one person, one creditor, one debtor. Physical facts being what they are, the statement is absurd on its face.

On our national debt, now mounting toward the forty-five billion limitation, we have an annual interest charge of more than a billion dollars. That interest charge can be paid either by borrowing, which of necessity means an increased interest charge, or it can be paid, as it will in the end be paid—if paid at all—by taxation.

The taxes to pay that billion dollars a year will be levied in large part upon, and collected from, the man who works. The man who toils in factory, mill, or mine, under summer's scorching sun or winter's freezing cold, will pay and pay and pay.

The same is true as to the payment of the principal of that debt. And to whom will that debt be paid? To the holders of tax-exempt, interest-bearing bonds.

The indirect taxes collected from the poor on the food they eat; the taxes collected from the man who works day in and day out to earn by physical toil his livelihood, are the sources of revenue from which the debt must be paid. And the worker will pay—and he will pay not to himself, not to his wife, not to his children—he will pay to those wealthy who buy the bonds of the Federal Government which are put out to borrow the money which this administration is spending

Yes, as the President told us, our children and our children's children will pay interest on this debt, and they will pay the debt and they will pay it through toil and hardship and privation; by denying themselves not only the luxuries but probably some of the necessities of life, in order to meet their tax payments; and they will pay it not to your children nor to mine but to the children of the economic royalists that the President so bitterly has condemned throughout his administration.

The President said last night that the big corporations should be taxed. True, they should; but after all has been said, after all has been done, the fact still remains that upon the man who toils, upon the small-business man, rests the greater portion of the burden of paying the taxes to operate our Government.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. And the children of the working people of America unto the third and fourth generations will sweat and toil to pay the principle and interest on the gigantic Roosevelt national debt. Yes; pay to the multimillionaire dollar-royalists like President Roosevelt, who was born with a gold and silver spoon in his mouth.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Certainly and to his associates, for he is an aristocrat, one of the privileged few, and so are his friends; and the children of the working class, yea, unto the third and the fourth generations, will continue to toil, to pay for vacation after vacation, trip after trip, which he has been taking at Government expense; to pay for that visit to London when he and his wife next fall return, in all the pomp and splendor with which he can surround himself, the visit which the King and Queen are now making to this country.

Oh, sure, sure. Smile if you want to, but you know it is true. You economic royalists, you politicians with golden crowns, are not going to pay it. The man who works, the farmer who trudges day after day behind his plow, his harrow or his drill, from early morn until late at night; the man who goes down into the darkness of the mine day after day; the man who sweats and toils in factory or in mill—he and his children are the ones who will pay; while in the Nation's Capital the President and his followers live like kings and spend and spend and spend. [Applause.]

Oh, the President may express his solicitude for the poor man, but he knows that it is the poor man, the worker, who furnishes the money to sustain our Government and, disregarding that knowledge, repudiating his expressions of sympathy, sneering at business, he goes laughingly, joyously, on his vacations, spends and spends and tells us that the debts we create we owe to ourselves.

Not only is his statement absurd—it is an insult to the intelligence of those who heard or read it.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. VREELAND].

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Chairman, I would like to propound a question to which I do not expect an answer because I believe it is like some of the unanswerable riddles such as "how long is a piece of string?" What I would like to ask is: just where are we going in this country and how are we going to get there? I am really sincere when I say that I have wondered about this ever since I arrived here in January, and day by day it becomes more perplexing. I am not an economist or a theorist, just a lawyer looking for a conclusion out of a maze of events.

We spend millions of dollars for reclamation to fertilize barren wastes of land so that the farmer can raise crops on what was formerly useless ground. We spend millions of dollars to show the farmer how to sow and till soil so that he may grow two blades of grass where he could only grow one before. Then we turn around and by reciprocal-trade agreements and lowered tariff allow foreign products, produced under labor conditions and standards of living much lower than ours, to be imported and sold for less than our farmers can produce them. We, because our own people cannot compete with the price of the imports and overproduction results, restrict the growth of home products and order the farmer to plow under his crops or refrain from planting on the land we just spent money to reclaim. Oh, yes, even our Chief Executive stimulates the purchase of foreign goods rather than home-grown when he orders Argentine beef because it is cheaper and better than American beef. But what is our farmer going to do with his idle land that he cannot use and how is he going to live with no income? That is easy. We must not hazard the good-neighbor policy abroad, and we must stimulate the humanitarianism of our administration so a bill is drafted and presented with much oratory, dramatics, and shedding of tears about the poor farmer who has no market for his products and we need millions of dollars to pay him for the nonproductive land. Pay him for not growing on land made fertile by the Government and ordered not to be used by the same authority. But then, to use the expression of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Rich], "Where are you going to get the money?" Well, that is easy, too. The Government still has credit so we will just float a few more bonds or perhaps we could let the national debt go up a little more. The people are kicking now, so a few more billions of debt will not make it any worse. Still we have overlooked two more sources where we can get it. There are still one or two large companies left that might have some money left so we can get some from them. Then, too, we just paid the farmer some money for not producing and, after all, the Government has to be supported, so we take back, through taxes, a good portion of the money we just paid him. Again I ask, Where are we going?

Seven years ago, there was raised by the candidate for Presidency and now incumbent the cry that it was time the spenders were taken out of office and much was made of the public debt. A promise was made that the Budget would be balanced in less time than it took to say it, if we only had a change and the country would be given a "new deal." It was the depression then, and prosperity was only around the corner with a new hand of cards. After 7 years, we no longer have the well-known depression, but we now have a recession. There are still 12,000,000 unemployed, there are more on relief now than ever before; the Government is still spending more than it ever did before; there is more labor unrest than ever before; and business is worse than ever before. Maybe the New Deal was four jokers and a deuce, with dcuces wild.

If I recall history correctly, this country grew to be the largest and richest in less time than any other country in the world. Our people have always enjoyed a higher standard of living with more comforts and conveniences than any other country in the world. Why? Because industry, capital, and labor worked together, without governmental interference, for their mutual good. There was incentive to go forward, to produce better and finer articles, to invent new things. Where there is incentive, there is prosperity. What has become of that prosperity? Could it be that the incentive is lacking? Certainly the Government has done nothing to destroy the desire to invest and produce. If anything, the Government has tried to help business. Had it not tried to assist by legislation regulating the business so that the company officials cannot make any mistakes in a business that the Government knows more about than those brought up in it? Then too much money is bad for anyone so, to prevent any mistakes by the officers, the Government takes the capital away by calling it excess profits. Then, to make sure that the consumer does not have the company put over anything on them, foreign products produced with cheap labor are allowed in at a price too low for local industry to compete with. And then, because the company cannot carry on, the Government loans it money upon the understanding that the company sign its life away. Then the Government builds and operates a similar business in competition to show how it should be done. To be sure the help to the company is complete we have the Labor Board. But where does the Government get the money? Taxes is one way. Where are they derived from? Individuals and business. The individuals must work for, or are, business; so, when business is deterred, the individual suffers, and when both suffer the Government has killed its source of revenue. Where is the incentive to go ahead? And again I ask, Where are we going?

Could it be at all possible that somewhere someone has the thought that the easiest and most subtle way to reduce a free people to that of servitude is by debt? I know of no more conclusive way to control a person than by having him reduced to a position of a sustaining financial obligation. Our present trend of increased Government expenditures means a greater national debt which can only be paid by confiscation. taxes, or inflation. Any of those methods, if carried too far, mean a destruction of capital and industry. A destruction of capital or industry means unemployment. Unemployment means a greater burden to the Government without source of income. So, to survive, the Government must operate business and place the people on Government employment. When the people have reached that point, they have no resources and are reliant upon the Government for their daily bread, and consequently are subservient to the Government. It is then no longer a Government by the people or of the people, and we have lost all that our forefathers fought for for years to build up. Could this be possible?

Mr. Chairman, I ask again, in all sincerity, Where are we going?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Bender].

A LOST GENERATION-OUR YOUTH OF TOMORROW

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, after listening to the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton], chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, I feel very much like singing that hymn, Oh, Paradise, Sweet Paradise, because he has put me in a frame of mind where I feel everything is glorious and fine and what is it all about anythou?

As far as I am personally concerned, I must be all wrong when I go back home week ends and find hundreds of people storming the gates looking for jobs, looking for any kind of work; young men and women just out of school trying to find a job. Before Mr. Roosevelt's time they could look forward to going into a shop or factory or getting into a business career and finding some work to do. The old people today are simply driftwood, wondering where in the world they are going, how they may find employment, looking for some place to get help as a result of our present conditions.

Since Mr. Roosevelt has been President you cannot find a man or woman over 45 years of age who can get a job in this country. The young people are in as bad shape as the old people. You wonder why we have all these new political movements. You wonder why we have all sorts of panaceas and all sorts of plans and programs presented to the people. It is because the people are desperate. They are wondering where they are going from here. I do not know anything about this high financing and all these big figures, involving mullions and billions of dollars. All I know is the actual experience I have with my people back home, the people who are in misery, in trouble, and looking for relief. Those are the people who tell me what is happening in this country.

The United States has created a lost generation. There are 20,000,000 young men and women in this country between the ages of 20 and 29, a great many of whom have never had a regular job, and many, many thousands of them will never be able to find such a job. In the city of New York alone, there are 400,000 boys and girls—highschool graduates everyone of them—who have never had work.

The New Deal has paved the way for this hopeless future. It has created a national condition which denies to this legion of youth the opportunity to make use of their abilities, their talents, their fine bodies, their good minds.

The men and women who spend their lives in social work tell us that regularly every day they see children of all ages who are undernourished, poorly clothed, sallow-faced. School teachers are constantly discovering among their classes youngsters who should be sent home on cold days because they are inadequately protected against the weather. In many places the school teachers themselves have used their own earnings to feed and clothe these extreme cases. But perhaps even worse than this intermittent condition of exposure and slow starvation is the psychological handicap these school children inevitably must undergo.

They see their fathers and mothers in constant want. Breakfast and dinner in their homes are equally meager; rent is a problem; necessary clothing hard to get. Most of them come to believe all too soon that there lies ahead only a barren, desolate youth, and a shabby, pleasureless maturity. Thousands of them are mentally trained for college, but they know that in spite of the New Deal's fine promises, in spite of the oft-praised N. Y. A., they will never see the inside of a college. In some fashion, they may be able to get together enough money to pay the tuition for a State school. But they know that they can never burden their folks with the additional expenses of clothes, books, and whatever else goes to make up even a bare college existence.

Below these discouraged graduates, we have an army of youngsters who find it next to impossible even to go through high school. There are many among them already so discouraged that they say, "What's the use of going to school?" even if they can get through. All they can see ahead of them after high school is a remote, disheartening W. P. A. ich

The New Deal depression has blighted the lives of these children of this great land of opportunity. It has created a mental barrier to hope; it has made it impossible for them to look forward to the future with any degree of security or confidence.

Did the New Dealers "plan it this way"?

Harry Hopkins, former chief overlord of W. P. A., declared it his official opinion that unemployment relief is a permanent problem in America. He made it clear on dozens of occasions that he considered W. P. A. a permanent institution in the American system. He wanted it to be stamped and sealed as "Here to stay."

Is this what our millions of mothers are content to accept? Are we training our children to be graduated to pick-and-shovel lives under the banner of W. P. A.? Are we willing to accept a system which prompted a high school graduating class to adopt as its class motto, "W. P. A., here we come"?

We are not saying this in opposition to W. P. A. We know that public employment for the time being is necessary. We feel that the New Deal's C. C. C. camps are performing a service. But we object to any government which falls into the attitude of considering this a normal standard of existence to which people must resign themselves. We object because this Government is willing to accept this unsatisfactory temporary device as a permanent condition. We object because the Republican Party believes a positive solution lies in the restoration of private enterprise. The Republican Party says to these discouraged young people of our Nation, "There still exists in this great land of ours plenty for all. Give private business a chance to offer it."

The Republican Party finds support for its attitude in the reactions of our young people themselves. They have already learned that the promise of Federal aid is an illusion.

Right in Cleveland, when a recent C. C. C. enrollment opened, the relief agencies found it impossible to induce young men of relief families to volunteer for this New Deal substitute for a private job. It was necessary to throw open C. C. C. registration to the children of folks not on relief to fill the quota prescribed.

We can understand why young men decline the offer to spend 6 months as a guest of Uncle Sam. They are rewarded for hard, physical work with $30 a month—and $25 of this is sent back to their parents. Five dollars a month with room and board for disciplined labor. Is it any wonder that millions of young fellows choose to loaf, to roam the country like wild boys of Russia at the beginning of the Soviet regime?

The New Deal has made no place whatsoever for the development of our rising generation in its scheme of things. The assistance offered to youth has been ill-planned without regard to future effects. Our youngsters have frequently become wards of the Government, regimented in camps, with their work, their hours, their food, their clothing, even their shelter regulated by Army officers. Now we reluctantly realize they already bear the impress of this experience.

No young man or woman can look forward under our New Deal program as it now exists to the who!esome development of his personality. Marriage has become one of those things that our young people either deny themselves or enter into recklessly or reluctantly afraid of what may happen. The emphasis on a stable family life has vanished because who can possibly consider the bringing up of children on $65 a month? And when family life is destroyed in America our national stability is threatened.

The Republican Party knows that relief for the unemployed is necessary. No party can ask people to suffer. We shall never let our people starve; we have always protected them in the past. When the depression hit us in 1930 and 1931, the Republican Party mobilized the Nation's resources quietly—but effectively. We took care of our people in those trying days without the creation of dozens of overlapping P. W. A. and W. P. A. bureaus.

Relief is necessary. But re-employment of our unemployed is even more necessary. It is vital to the citizens of America of every age. It is crucial for our young people if they are to grow up to decent, honorable citizenship; if they are to be spared the deterioration of a dependent existence.

We in America know today that the contradictory policies of the present administration, its harsh attitude and the increasing burdens of taxation, have driven industry into the storm cellars. Businessmen are afraid of the fireside chat over the radio, the tax collector, the letter with a governmental frank on it. They have learned only too well that every New Deal statement may contain a dagger for them, It is not surprising that the steel furnaces have operated at a small fraction of their capacity; that our railroads are now so reduced that they buy neither necessary equipment nor pay willing wages.

All this vanishing opportunity becomes a sinking weight around the necks of our youth. They cannot get jobs today merely to live. And tomorrow, these same men and women are going to be asked to pay off the debts which have been piled up in the process of dragging them down to poverty. This is something which haunts the future ahead, this $41,000,000,000 national debt.

In 1933, the New Deal Chief told our people, "For 3 long years, the Federal Government has been on the road to bankruptcy." If that was true in 1933, by this time we certainly have arrived. For we now owe to our creditors $20,-000,000,000 more than we owed then. And we have accomplished nothing by the spending; we have just as many people out of work today as we had, the 13,000,000 or more. In addition, we have built up a vast machinery of Federal bureaus. We have created a "standing" army of 3,000,000 W. P. A. workers, existing on a submarginal standard of living.

This is the picture which faces our youth.

Today they have nothing, not even hope. Tomorrow they shall have increased taxes-and continuing despair.

The conscience of America cannot tolerate a continuation of this program. We do not wish to rear a generation of dependents. We want our children to grow into upright, stalwart, proud, self-reliant men and women.

The Democratic New Deal has betrayed our youth. It has taken them to the top of the mountain and pointed out the Valley of the Promised Land-only to dash them from the cliff to the ground below.

N. Y. A., C. C. C., W. P. A .- is this to be the highway of youth? Is this to be the new system replacing a job, marriage, family?

The Republican Party declares that we cannot accept this New Deal philosophy and survive as a Nation. We must challenge the present procedure. We must insist that our young people be given an opportunity to live their lives as we know Americans can.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Johns].

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time to issue a warning to those of you who may be desirous of borrowing money and raising the debt limit of this country. I was very much interested in what the President had to say last night about this being an internal debt and that our children would pay the interest.

Mr. Chairman, that is the great danger in the present situation, as I see it. These bonds are now being held by the banks of the country. If we ever reach the point, Mr. Chairman, where the people cannot have confidence in our Government and these obligations have to be paid, if the people go to the banks and find out that they cannot get their money, I want to tell you it will be a dangerous thing for the country, because when they go there and are not able to get their money there will be trouble.

Today the banks have 25 percent of their deposits and 60 percent of their total assets invested in Government obligations, while the insurance companies hold approximately four and one-half billion dollars of this debt. When we reach the point where the people lose confidence in our Government being able to pay these obligations, it will mean the end of our present form of government. That is the danger as I see it. It does not make very much difference whether our children have to pay or not. It will have to be paid anyway. It would be much better, of course, if we owed this money to a foreign government and could at some future date repudiate it like they have done with us. But that is not the case. We are furnishing this money out of our own bank deposits, out of the savings and deposits of our old people, widows, and orphans. That is the danger as I see it in this whole thing. [Applause,]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I would like to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. REED of New York. Is there anything in the rule to prevent a Member from discussing this particular bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, a discussion of the bill under consideration is in order.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take very much time and I shall confine myself for a few minutes at least to the pending bill.

In the first place, under the Second Liberty Bond Act the amount of bonds having 5 years or more to run which may be outstanding at any time was limited to $30,000,000,000. The rest of the fifteen billion, up to $45,000,000,000, would be in the form of short-term notes.

Mr. Chairman, I just want to offer a thought right here, because it is a matter which, in my opinion, has been overlooked.

I am not opposed to this bill, but may I say that when it is passed the Secretary of the Treasury may issue $15,000,-000,000 worth of long-term bonds, tax-exempt. We have heard a great deal from the President of the United States in regard to the evils of these tax-exempt bonds. He has sent two messages to the Congress on this subject, one in 1938 and one in January of the present year, urging the Congress to correct the situation. No action has been taken. There never was a better time to meet that issue than by this present bill, but nothing has been done about it.

When this measure goes over to the Senate, I am not sure that under the parliamentary situation that body can amend the bill to tax Government bonds; but assuming it can, this is not a revenue bill; consequently, it cannot attach an amendment to this bill that will tax State and municipal bonds. As a result we are foreclosed from meeting the issue that has been presented by the President of the United States. We have the particular inconsistency of the President, in season and out of season, over the radio and in the press, speaking against these people who are hiding their money in taxexempt securities. Yet if we pass this bill today, in a Congress under the President's own control, the Secretary of the Treasury can issue $15,000,000,000 of tax-exempt securities. I want it distinctly understood by the Members of this House that I am opposed to granting authority to the Federal Government to tax State and municipal bonds, because it will interfere with their necessary borrowing power and increase the cost of local government.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

Mr. REED of New York. I have only a very few minutes, and there are other matters I wish to discuss.

It was not my purpose when I took the floor to say one word that had any political significance. This was a unanimous report on the part of the committee. The idea was to pass this bill without any vote or any difficulties whatever. However, we have heard a great deal today about the year of 1929 and the Hoover administration. I just want to remind this House and the country that the Republican Party inherited something many years ago. After the Democratic Party had kept us out of war long enough to win an election, we inherited a debt of $26,000,000,000. We also inherited 7,000,000 men unemployed and walking the streets. We inherited 4,000,000 veterans out of work and 67,000 mental cases resulting from the war. We inherited a situation where no provision had been made for their hospitalization or care. We inherited a bankrupt railroad system and a marine organization equipped with boats that would sink when they were tied to the docks; they would not even float. We inherited thousands of planes that never could be taken off the ground because they simply would not fly.

We inherited all that, yet within 2 years we put 7,000,000 men back to work, we reduced the debt $1,000,000,000 every year for over 10 years until the national debt was down to approximately $16,000,000,000, and we went through an experience then that is quite new to some of us now: we reduced taxes five times until less than 2 percent of the people paid any income tax at all.

That was the situation, and now, of course, you would like to charge us with responsibility for a world-wide catastrophe, the backwash of the war, which was met more heroically than any emergency of such character and devastating effect, than had ever risen before throughout the history of mankind. This catastrophe was the result of a Democratic administration interfering in European affairs.

I have heard something said about the deficit incurred by Hoover. You claim it was over $3,558,485,637. Let me tell you that $2,397,267,363 of that sum was in recoverable loans, which were recovered and which this administration has spent. All you inherited as a debt was $1,161,218,274, and that is all.

Mr. McCORMACK and Mr. SHORT rose.

Mr. REED of New York. No; I cannot yield. I have a limited time.

That is all you inherited from the Republican administration. If you subtract what we paid of the bonds of Grover Cleveland, we almost gave you a surplus when you went into office. You have incurred obligations that will plague and distress this and future generations of the United States, actual and contingent, of $54,000,000,000, and you cannot charge a cent of that to the Republican administration. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, it is indeed amazing to listen to the gentlemen on the left, my Republican friends, tell how much they are interested in the wage earners. For instance, my beloved friend from Michigan [Mr. Hoffman], who day in and day out assails anything and everything that may help the wage earner, today is fearful that this bill, unanimously reported by the committee and conceded by all to be legislation in the right direction, might result in the poor wage earner having to pay the interest on this bonded indebtedness. The gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentleman from Ohio said the same thing. I was tempted to congratulate the gentleman from New York, hoping he would speak along the same lines as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Wolcott], but lo and behold, he followed in the footsteps of the other Republicans who are trying in every conceivable far-fetched way to mislead the American people and deny the great good that has been accomplished by President Roosevelt and the Democratic administration.

Let me say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Reed], that we all remember the great and glorious times that were given us by Hoover and his administration. Everyone was happy, contented, and prosperous during the years from 1929 to 1933 if Republican speeches were to be believed. Well, you might make people believe that such was the case. You can fool them sometimes, but you cannot fool them all the time. You are good at it. I know you are trying hard, but all your efforts will be in vain, because people today understand, appreciate, and recognize the great efforts that are being made for the Nation, for the people, for the wage earners, for the farmers, and for the businessmen of America by this great President of ours, Franklin D. Roosevelt. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCor-Mack].

Mr. McCORMACK rose.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois. Mr. PARSONS. Is the gentleman going to talk about the bill?

Mr. McCORMACK. Briefly; yes.

Mr. Chairman, I think the little political flurry that has happened this afternoon is very interesting. I like to see a flurry of this kind. It puts a little pep in us.

I was rather interested and pleased to notice that my friend from Michigan, the distinguished Republican ranking member of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. Wolcott], spoke on the bill, but he expressed a fear—and I can assure you there is no necessity for any such fear existing in our minds—the fear of inflation. There is absolutely no question of inflation involved in this bill. Of course, my distinguished friend is so enveloped in the atmosphere of banking and currency that he sees the specter of danger in every bill that comes before the House which is remotely connected with the question of banking and currency; and bond issues, I suppose, have some remote connection with matters which relate to banking and currency. At least, bond issues have some relation to banking, but not so much to currency.

I can assure my friends on both sides of the aisle that if the gentleman from Michigan offers his amendment there is no justification for adopting it. This bill came out of the committee by the unanimous vote of 15 Democratic members and 10 Republican members.

I think the membership of the House can give some of us Members on Ways and Means—and I speak without regard to party—some credit for giving the question of inflation consideration, if there is any fear about that being involved in the pending bill.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman will agree, I am sure, that this same bill was also unanimously reported by the Ways and Means Committee last year and passed the House by unanimous consent. All in the world the bill does is simply to remove the partition. Under existing law there is a $45,-000,000,000 limit as to our national debt. A partition exists there limiting that to $30,000,000,000 in long-term bonds and the balance in short term notes. This bill leaves the ceiling or the maximum just as it is now and just takes out that partition so as to enable the Treasury Department to be able to meet situations as they arise from day to day in the money markets of the world.

Mr. McCORMACK. I thank the gentleman for his observations, which are correct.

Like the other Members I enjoyed the various remarks that were made today. One Member talked about there being no opportunity for employment of those over 45 years of age. One thing is certain, you cannot blame President Roosevelt for that. That condition exists in business, if it exists at all.

My distinguished friend from New York [Mr. Reed] apparently, tried to intimate that the President was inconsistent in not having the bonds that might be issued subject to taxation.

I am not saying how I shall vote on the question of subjecting bonds issued by State and municipal governments, as well as the Federal Government, to the income tax, but, certainly, without regard to how we may feel on that question, few of us would want to have the Federal Government issue its bonds subject to the income-tax laws of the States, and on the other hand not have State or municipal bonds subject to the income-tax laws of the Federal Government.

I want to correct my friend from New York [Mr. Reed], who made the statement that when President Hoover ended his term there was only a deficit of a little over $3,000,000,000. Not for the purpose of controversy, because I admire President Hoover as well as I do President Roosevelt, because he was my President when in office just the same as President Roosevelt is my President today; but I did not agree with all of Mr. Hoover's policies. That is no reason, however, why I should not respect him. There is no reason why I should hate him because he is a Republican. No more than a Republican should hate President Roosevelt because he is a Democrat. Certainly my views are entirely different than those of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Reed]. When President Hoover left office the deficit during his last 3 years was not a little over $3,000,000,000 but slightly over $6,000,000,000.

Now, coming back to the bill. The bill is unanimously reported by the committee. The only opposition is that expressed by my distinguished friend from Michigan, who expressed a fear of inflation. Without regard to what your views may be in any other respect on this bill, there is absolutely no justification for that argument, and there is equally no justification for any such fear.

I hope no amendment to the bill will be offered; but if one is offered, I hope, without regard to the middle aisle, the bill being reported out unanimously—10 Republicans and 15 Democrats—that any such amendment will be defeated. [Applause.]

The clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 21 of the Second Liberty Bond Act (49 Stat. 21, as amended; U. S. C., Supp. IV, title 31, sec. 757b), is amended by striking out the following proviso: "Provided, That the face amount of bonds issued under the authority of this act shall not exceed in the aggregate $30,000,000,000 outstanding at any one time."

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Wolcott: On page 1, strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That section 21 of the Second Liberty Bond Act (49 Stat. 21, as amended; U. S. C. Supp. IV, title 31, sec. 757b), is amended to read as follows: The face amount of bonds, certificates of indebtedness, Treasury bills, and notes issued under the authority of this act, and certificates of indebtedness issued under the authority of section 6 of the First Liberty Bond Act, shall not exceed in the aggregate $45,000,000,000 outstanding at any one time: Provided, That the face amount of bonds issued under the authority of this act shall not exceed in the aggregate $33,000,000,000 outstanding at any one time."

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, this merely increases the authorization for the issuance of Government bonds by $3,000,000,000 within the present total limitation. According to the report of the committee, the Treasury can at the present time, within the present limitation of $30,000,000, issue $1,697,026,819 of long-time bonds. If the amendment which I have introduced is adopted, the Treasury may issue the amount which I have just stated, plus $3,000,000,000, making the aggregate within the present authorization, or within the authorization if the amendment is agreed to, of $4,697,026,-819. For all purposes, even though the deficit for the next year greatly exceeds the estimate, that will be an extremely high ceiling, and will cause no embarrassment whatsoever to the Treasury Department, and to their financing program. There is a certain amount of short-term indebtedness each year, which is converted into long-term indebtedness. We must not lose sight of the fact that we have gotten into the habit of issuing short-term indebtedness, Treasury bills and notes for the purpose of keeping the interest rate down, in anticipation of revenue receipts. If in June or July, or any quarter, it is anticipated that the revenue receipts are going to be so many millions of dollars, the Treasury is justified in issuing short-term obligations against the receipts of those returns and they are canceled. In the meantime they get a very favorable rate of interest, much less than 1 percent, and on long-term obligations, the thing which attracts people to invest in them; of course a higher rate of interest is paid.

So short-term indebtedness is justified many times in anticipation of revenue receipts. So I have not sought in this amendment to detract whatsoever from the authority which is now given to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue short-term certificates, notes, bills, and so forth. I want him to have that authority because if properly handled he can save the Government a good many million dollars by issuing short-term indebtedness against revenue receipts, and that will accomplish the purpose which he seeks. the national debt on July 1, 1940, approaches $45,000,000,000, whether we like to do it or not, we have got to increase the limitation. It is a deplorable situation and I hate to think of it. I hate to contemplate the time when we will have to raise it to $50,000,000,000, but have this in mind, that we must have an adequate differential between the amount of long-term obligations outstanding and short-term obligations outstanding, or we force an increase in the volume of currency. What you do under this act, if you enact it without this limitation, is to force the Treasury into the situation where it has to retire its short-term indebtedness by the issuance of currency under the authority given to the President. I understand that that amounts to almost $11,000,-000,000. That specific authority granted to the President does not come within the limitation of this $45,000,000,000, and that is why I make the contention, and I think I have justified it, that in passing this act without my amendment we virtually authorize a rise in the debt limitation of $11,000,000,000 through the amount which the President is specifically authorized to issue currency over the $45,000,000,000.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. There is absolutely no justification whatever for any of the fear expressed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Wolcott]. There is nothing in this bill that involves the question of inflation. As already pointed out, your Committee on Ways and Means considered this matter last year and unanimously reported this same bill, which passed the House by unanimous consent and then went to the Senate. The partition at that time was at the figure of $25,000,000,000 for long-term bonds and $20,000,000,000 for short-term notes and evidences of indebtedness. The House bill removed this partition and the Senate put it back at thirty billion. The effect of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan would mean that we would have to do the job all over again, just as we are having to do it today, because somebody placed an amendment in the bill. All this bill does is to leave the ceiling or limitation of $45,000,000,000 just as it is today and remove the partition of $30,000,000,000 for longterm bonds and the balance for short-term notes, so as to allow the Secretary of the Treasury discretionary authority to deal with the situation that is presented in the money market of the country in order to finance this Government of ours.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. COOPER. Yes; briefly.

Mr. FISH. That is the important point. I think the gentleman is right. This is merely permissive legislation. This does not make it mandatory to issue long-term bonds. Mr. COOPER. That is true.

Mr. FISH. He can have as many as he wants. He does not have to have the whole forty-five billion. He can have short-term notes if he wants to.

Mr. COOPER. That is true. The gentleman is absolutely correct. It is only discretionary authority that the Secretary of the Treasury may use in order to meet the situation that exists in the bond market of the country and in order to effect the most economy and protect the best interests of the Government.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield further? Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. But under no condition, as I see it—and I ask the gentleman from Tennessee, who is as sound a Member of the House as there is—is there any question of inflation involved in this bill?

Mr. COOPER. Absolutely not. There is nothing of the kind. The Ways and Means Committee has considered the matter thoroughly at two different times and unanimously reported it, and this is the first time the question of inflation has ever been raised. We have 10 members of the minority on our committee, who are as diligent and as able men as there are in this House. They certainly would not want to see any inflationary measure presented here. There is nothing of that kind involved in this bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. What is the objection to limiting this to thirty-three billion if that is well within the amount of refunding operations?

Mr. COOPER. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the gentleman explain, in connection with that, why we put the limitation in there in the first place if it was not to prevent inflation?

Mr. COOPER. We did not do it. The Senate did it and assigned no reason for it that I know of. We are asking here to do again just what we had to do last year.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Why did the Congress put the limitation in originally if it was not to prevent inflation? The gentleman, of course, knows that.

Mr. COOPER. I certainly do not know it, and the gentleman from Michigan does not know it either. You read me one line of evidence from the hearings or from the record to justify your position which you are taking here today.

Mr. WOLCOTT. All right. Why was the limitation put in there? The gentleman has not answered that.

Mr. COOPER. I regret I must decline to yield further, as my time is limited. There is nothing whatever to justify the position taken by the gentleman here; not one line of the record, not one line of evidence to justify any such position as that, and the gentleman cannot cite anything of that kind.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I can if the gentleman will yield to me. Mr. COOPER. You have spoken twice on the bill and you have not done it yet.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. This bill in its operation applies only to evidences of indebtedness. It has nothing at all to do with the issuance of currency.

Mr. COOPER. That is absolutely true.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. COOPER. I am sorry I cannot yield to the gentleman all the time I have when he has spoken twice already.

The President has authority now and has had it since 1933 to provide for the issuance of $3,000,000,000 in currency under the Thomas amendment to the Agricultural Act, and he has never used that authority. He has never indicated that he wanted to involve this country in inflation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

BOND LIMIT

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, in regard to this bill being inflationary, if the bond limit should be reached and it is not extended, the President would be compelled to use his authority under the Thomas amendment referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cooper] that was in the Agricultural Act approved May 12, 1933.

SO-CALLED GREENBACK AMENDMENT

The so-called greenback amendment that is in the Agricultural Adjustment Act of May 12, 1933, which was sponsored by United States Senator Elmer Thomas, of Oklahoma, is as follows:

(1) To direct the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be issued in such amount or amounts as he may from time to time order United States notes, as provided in the act entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes and for the redemption of funding thereof and for funding the floating debt of the United States", approved February 25, 1862, and acts supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof, in the same size and of similar color to the Federal Reserve notes heretofore issued and in denominations of $1, $5, $10, $20, $50, $100, $500, $1,000, and $10,000; but notes issued under this subsection shall be issued only for the purpose of meeting maturing Federal obligations to repay sums borrowed by the United States and for purchasing United States: Provided, That when any such notes are used for such purpose, the bond or other obligation so acquired or taken up shall be retired and canceled. Such notes shall be issued at such times and in such amounts as the President may approve but the aggregate amount of such notes outstanding at any time shall not exceed $3,000,000,000. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, an amount sufficient to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to retire and cancel 4 per centum annually of such outstanding notes, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to retire and cancel annually 4 per centum of such outstanding notes. Such notes and all other coins and currencies heretofore or hereafter coined or issued by or under the authority of the United States shall be legal tender for all debts public and private.

This Thomas amendment provides that the President may issue $3,000,000,000 in United States notes. It is an expansion of the act of February 25, 1862. Under that act of 1862 the Government has outstanding today $346,000,000 in United States notes, and $156,000,000 in gold is set aside as a reserve to secure those notes. If this bond limit is not raised, when the time comes the President will be compelled to issue these United States notes.

Personally I am not afraid of the issuance of those notes. I think the administration has been deflationary and overcautious rather than tending toward inflation or expansion. I think it has gone too much that way myself. For instance, in 1936, when the veterans were paid on June 15, the country was going back, and I believe there was sufficient money in circulation to put the country back, but the Federal Reserve Board did not agree. They raised the reserve requirements of banks and plowed under or destroyed more than $3,000,000,000 worth of potential credit and potential currency. Not only that, it sterilized a lot of the gold that came into the country. In other words, the brakes were put on so quickly, so suddenly, and so effectively that it destroyed the good influence of the distribution of that large sum of money to the veterans. So instead of the administration being inflationary, I think it has been very much the other way. Certainly the President has not indicated that he was in favor of inflation.

Therefore, instead of it being inflation and extending beyond the limit, it will probably force inflation to the extent of $3,000,000,000 if the bond limit is not raised, if there is demand for it.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman-

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. FISH. I wish to be recognized to speak on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman rises in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I am not very much opposed to the amendment, but I feel that the amendment is unnecessary. I believe that the gentleman from Tennessee is correct, that this is permissive legislation. The Treasury Department is asking this in order to facilitate their borrowing. The tragedy of this—in order to show a little partisanship once in a while [laughter]—the tragedy of it is that the administration has no financial policy except to pile deficit upon deficit, debt upon debt, by borrowing additional billions, or issuing billions of additional tax-exempt securities. That is their only financial policy.

So they come to us and ask this permissive legislation. I am fearful that we have got to give it to them because they cannot raise money in any other way. They do not dare raise money in any other way. They do not dare do away with these tax-exempt securities. They are asking this because it is the only way they can raise money—through issuing more billions of tax-exempt securities.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I may say to the gentleman from New York that if he is interested in exempting further issues of securities from taxation it would, in my opinion, be germane to offer such an amendment to this bill as a limitation against the bond issues that may occur under it.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman offer that amendment?

Mr. WOLCOTT. No; I will not support it.

Mr. FISH. I think it is not germane to the bill, so I will not offer it.

This is merely permissive legislation. I believe this will cost the Government a little more. Long-time financing through bond issues always costs more, because the interest rate is higher—something like 3 percent instead of the one-half or three-quarters of 1 percent, whatever it is, on short-term notes. So while the proposal will cost a little more because of long-time financing, yet we have got to go along with it. It seems to me the purpose of this particular bill is to get permission to increase the long-term bonded indebtedness which is necessary because the New Deal is otherwise financially bankrupt. It may add to our expenses; nevertheless, the administration has no other means of getting money.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. I think the gentleman will agree that it is best to have long-term financing. I am not talking about the present administration; I am talking generally. When short-term indebtedness becomes too great in amount, it should be converted into long-term bonds.

Mr. FISH. I would agree thoroughly with the gentleman if those bonds were tax-exempt; but if these bonds were not tax-exempt you could not sell them to the public.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am not talking about their being

Mr. FISH. I am; but I am not opposing this bill. I am opposed to the amendment offered by my colleague. I think the amendment is not justified in view of the fact that the specific purpose of this bill is merely permissive; granting permission to issue more long-term bonds. The Treasury Department cannot go above the $45,000,000,000 debt limit. I am not recommending this as a proper way of financing, but the New Deal cannot raise money in any other way. I am sorry, however, to see that these bonds will be tax-exempt. They will have to be tax-exempt securities, because you could not sell them to the public otherwise.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. I think the tax-exemption question is being demagogued upon more than any question I have heard. Mr. FISH. Would not the gentleman like to do away with it himself?

Mr. McCORMACK. I am not so sure, because when you vote to remove it from bonds of the Federal Government you have got to remove it from bonds of States and municipalities. This means $113,000,000 a year to the States. Does the gentleman favor that?

Mr. FISH. I would do away with all tax-exempt securities. Tax exemption is an utterly vicious thing.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am glad the gentleman once has risen to the heights of statesmanship.

Mr. FISH. I am glad I have at least once. That is better than the gentleman has done himself.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Does the gentleman not know it to be a fact that the President has sent two messages to Congress affirmatively recommending that tax-exempt securities be done away with?

Mr. FISH. But the President was perfectly well aware in advance that that would not even be reported out of committee, or he would never have sent the message, because if he got what he asked for there would be no way of financing the New Deal expenditures.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That is one thing that I know the President is insisting be given consideration.

Mr. FISH. I do not believe he means a word of it. [Ap-lause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment close in 5 minutes. The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, repeatedly Members of the House, as well as others on the outside, are telling us of the exceedingly low interest rates that are being paid by the Government on its borrowed money. They point to this fact approvingly and apparently with considerable pride. Evidently they look upon it not only as a desideratum which is of service in an emergency, but actually representing a truly healthy state of the Federal finances.

Certainly the slightest reflection should convince us that the exceedingly low interest rates which the Government is paying indicate neither a desirability nor a healthy state of the finances. Though I, myself, as well as others, have repeatedly pointed out to this House the reasons for these abnormally low interest rates under the ominous national financial picture that confronts us, I believe the facts relating to this matter can neither be too often stressed or repeated.

These interest rates, which are the lowest in the history of our country, are so for the simple reason that the industry of our Nation is also depressed to an extent never before experienced. Though deposits in banks increased about $12,000,000,000 from 1932 to 1938, commercial loans decreased during the same period of time about two billions. The capital-investment market, as is well known, is practically moribund. The demand for commercial loans and new capital being perhaps the lowest in the history of our country, why should interest rates not also be the lowest?

There is another phase of this financial picture which should throw considerable light on this question. It is well known that during periods of currency inflation the demand for commercial loans and new capital is always low. Though the Government is not engaged at the present in printing money in the sense of actually inflating the currency in circulation by its method of financing its deficit, it is creating bank-credit money. There is in our banks at present no less than $15,000,000,000 of such flat credit. When it is reflected that the Government obligations are not actually sold to the banks and paid for out of the savings of the people, but that they are merely allocated to the banks where they are set up as deposits, it should readily be seen that here is a powerful factor that makes for diminishing interest rates.

Taking these stated facts into consideration, together with the still more important truth that it is impossible today to write a value clause into any contract in terms of the standard unit of value, which also is an unusual experience in this country, one can hardly look upon the lowest interest rates with any feeling of satisfaction or pride. Indeed, this state of affairs instead of being something we should boast about, is a thing which should give us most serious concern. Instead of reflecting a healthy state of our finance, it does the opposite. Interest rates are the lowest in the history of our Nation because confidence is the lowest in our history.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. SHORT. Is not cheap money and low interest rates always and invariably a sure sign of sick industry and unhealthy finance?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Wolcott) there were—ayes 40, noes 74.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Schafer of Wisconsin: In line 8, after the word "time", insert "and shall not be tax exempt."

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order | against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment on the ground it is not germane to the bill now under consideration, and in the form offered would not be germane to the act that is here sought to be amended.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman. Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat surprised to find a New Deal leader making a point of order that my amendment is not germane. This amendment is interwoven with and relates to the subject of Federal financing covered by the pending bill. The President of the United States sent two messages to Congress asking the Congress to enact legislation which would prohibit the Government from issuing tax-exempt bonds. He also asked for this legislation during a number of his radio fireside chats. In my humble way I am trying to follow the advice of the President of the United States, although the Members on his side of the House have run out on him. This amendment is germane, as it is a limitation, and it will give the New Deal an opportunity to act as well as talk about the necessity of ending the Government tax-exempt bond racket.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

This very question was decided by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole on January 25, 1935. Therefore, under the precedents the Chair is constrained to rule that the amendment is not germane, and sustains the point of order raised by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cooper].

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I intend to vote against this bill if for no other reason than on the question of economy. I was somewhat surprised and astounded to find the leaders of the New Deal making a point of order against my amendment which carried out the request of the President of the United States as expressed in several messages which he sent to the Congress and in a number of his radio fireside chats. Why do you new dealers talk in favor of abolishing Government taxexempt bonds and then oppose my amendment which will do that very thing? Mr. PATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I do not yield because my time is limited.

Mr. PATRICK. I know that.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, the President last night indicated that we should not worry about the great increase in our national debt because that debt was held by Americans and would be paid off by Americans to Americans. Certainly the rank and file, the great masses of our working men and women of America-industrial and agricultural-and their children unto the third and fourth generations, will sweat and toil to produce the tax dollars to pay the principal of this Roosevelt New Deal staggering national debt and the annual stupendous interest payments thereon. The payments will go to another class of people, such as our multimillionaire New Deal leaders-President Roosevelt, Owen D. Young, Jimmy Cromwell, Harold Ickes, Jim Farley, Lehman Bros., Vincent Astor, Mr. Roosevelt's right-hand man; Barney Baruch, Cudahy, Bullitt, Taussig, Goldwyn, Doherty, Bloom, Swope, Filene, Gimbel, Kirstein, Sarnoff, Stern, Straus, Berry, McAdoo, Guffey, Davies, Kaufman, Eugene Meyer, Sumner Welles-and members of the international munitions house of Du Pont, which was recently joined in the holy bonds of matrimony with the international banking house of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, and so forth.

I could continue to name multimillionaire New Deal associates of our multimillionaire New Deal President until the sun sank in the west tonight. However, I only have 5 minutes so that I will have to give you the names of the rest at a later date.

Mr. Chairman, the proponents of this bill have told us that it will not increase the national-debt limit one penny, that the bill merely provides for an increase of the limitation in the amount of long-term bonds which may be outstanding and a decrease in limitation of the amount of the shortterm other obligations.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], indicated that the short-term obligations can be sold in America by the Treasury at an interest rate of six-tenths of 1 percent. From the standpoint of economy, when Uncle Sam can borrow billions of dollars at an interest rate of six-tenths of 1 percent, it is absurd to pass this bill and pay the international money changers 3-, 4-, or 5-percent interest.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the action of the committee in respect to the amendment limiting the issuance of long-term obligations to $33,000,000,000, if given an opportunity I will offer a motion to recommit this bill to the Ways and Means Committee without any recommendation. I think it is apparent from the debate here today that much more consideration should be given to this question than has been given it either by the Ways and Means Committee or by the House today. Surely there can be no objection to having this matter referred to a committee which is competent to take the subject and analyze it fully in light of the debate which we have carried on today. The only purpose in offering the motion to recommit is in order that the Members of the House who have spoken against the bill may have an opportunity to clarify these issues before a standing committee of the House.

If I am given the opportunity to offer this motion to recommit, I hope it will prevail; and I shall offer it without any feeling that the motion is against the principles of the bill or against the merits of the bill, but merely in order that under orderly practice and procedure we may be given an opportunity to give further consideration to a subject which is as important as any bill we have considered on the floor during this session.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan. Mr. CRAWFORD. I have been trying to get the floor to ask one question in connection with a matter raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack] about long-term bonds. If the long-term bonds are to be held primarily by the banks and the bank portfolios, and the banks are then not able to convert the long terms into currency upon immediate demand, is it not true it will be a dangerous thing if a major portion of the debt is in the form of long-term bonds?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. While, on the other hand, if the debt is primarily not long-term bonds, and is held primarily by people outside the banks, then it would not be necessary to have the bonds convertible into currency on immediate notice, the people thereby carrying the major burden.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I believe the gentleman has stated the matter correctly. We must bear in mind that Government spending or the creation of long-term Government obligations is always immediately inflationary. Whether you like to admit it or not, that is true, because those bonds are used as the basis for inflation. They are ultimately deflationary because when they become due we have got to pay them and that draws money and credit from the market which would otherwise be used for expansion.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Texas. Mr. PATMAN. Why should there be a danger, considering the question brought up by the gentleman from Michigan, when the banks have now more than $14,000,000,000 in Government bonds that they can immediately convert into money and issue $6 to $1 on every dollar?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think the gentleman put his thumb right on the question when he said that we could use the power granted to the President to issue currency instead of issuing these obligations. I have not always agreed with the gentleman in that respect. That is why I am here today stating there is a danger of inflation by the expansion of the currency base. But the gentleman has made out just about as good a case as anyone could in that respect by stating that if this bill is passed then it might force the President to use the power to issue currency instead of issuing short-term obligations. That is one reason why I would like this bill sent back to the Ways and Means Committee so that the gentleman from Texas, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD], and I, and all the rest of us here who have spoken on this question-the whole country is involved-may have an opportunity to go before the committee and thrash this thing out and find out if we have been under a delusion all these years with respect to Government credit and Government finance.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan. Mr. CRAWFORD. If I am correctly informed, when Germany started their spin of the wheel they sold government obligations to the banks and the banks instead of handling the matter as we do in this country issued currency in exchange for the bonds. In this country our banks issue credit to the Treasury of the United States for the bonds. If the gentleman can, I wish he would enlighten us on that just a little bit and draw a comparison between what is going on in this country and what it is likely to end up in, and the German situation.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am fearful that by passing this bill in its present form, we are giving encouragement to a situation in the United States, comparable to that which impelled inflation in post-war Germany. That resulted, as we all know, in the destruction of almost all private wealth in Germany.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I want to state briefly the position of the President, as I understand it, on tax-exempt securities. I do not believe it is fair for Members to rise here and even in good faith close their eyes to the truth, a truth which is apparent to all of us, and to make statements which do not reflect the position of the President. The implication is made in the argument today that because we do not subject Federal Government bonds to the income-tax laws of the Federal Government and the several States the President is inconsistent in his position. That is as far away from the truth as anything I can conceive. The President has recommended that all bonds. Federal, State, and municipal, be subject to the income-tax laws of the Federal Government and the State governments and has made this recommendation in two different messages. Presidents of the past, Republican Presidents, have made the same recommendation.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Is it not a fact that the President does not recommend placing a tax on tax-exempt securities but does recommend that the income from all bonds be taxed?

Mr. McCORMACK. Of course, the President's recommendation is that the interest be subject to the income-tax laws of the Federal Government and the States, that is, the interest on all bonds, Federal, State, and municipal.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Mich-

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman is stating the position of the President?

Mr. McCORMACK. I am stating my understanding of his

Mr. MICHENER. Yes. Well, I think it is wrong. I am a member of the Committee on the Judiciary. Shortly after one of these messages came up to which the gentleman has referred, our committee was going to give consideration to a constitutional amendment. That was before the last decision, which might have clarified the matter.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman has stated that what I said was wrong. Just prove where what I said was wrong.

Mr. MICHENER. I am going to show it.

Mr. McCORMACK. I challenge the gentleman's statement. I address myself to that. Wherein is my statement wrong that the President's message was with reference to subjecting the interest on all bonds, Federal, State, and municipal, to the income-tax laws of the Federal Government and the States?

Mr. MICHENER. That is not the part of the gentleman's statement that is wrong.

Mr. McCORMACK. Where is it wrong? Mr. MICHENER. If the gentleman will permit me, I will try to show him.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am anxious; the gentleman is taking my time.

Mr. MICHENER. I will withdraw if I am embarrassing the gentleman.

Mr. McCORMACK. Just do not make a speech.

Mr. MICHENER. If the gentleman will permit me to answer, I was stating that shortly after the President's message came up here our committee attempted to give consideration to the problem and do what the President asked the Congress

Mr. McCORMACK. That was last year.

Mr. MICHENER. After we had set the day for the hearing we were called off, so to speak, and never did hold a hearing. I believe it was generally understood by everybody that this was because it would interfere with financing by the Government. Nothing was done and nothing has been done to this very day to accomplish what the President asked be done, although the committee was ready and willing to do

Mr. McCORMACK. Is the gentleman through with my time? Nothing that the gentleman has stated, certainly, is inconsistent with what I said, when the gentleman says I am wrong and predicates his statement-

Mr. MICHENER. Oh, the gentleman is always right.

Mr. McCORMACK. I thank the gentleman for the compliment, but the gentleman is inconsistent. Only a moment ago he said the gentleman from Massachusetts was wrong. The gentleman from Massachusetts cannot be wrong 2 minutes ago and always right now.

Mr. MICHENER. I withdraw it, then.

Mr. McCORMACK. I just want to say that the President's suggestion is to subject to tax the interest on the bonds of both State and Federal Governments. Certainly few of us would subject the interest on the Federal Government bonds to the State income tax laws and let the interest on the State and municipal bonds be tax exempt. That has been the position of the President consistently.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman from Michigan must be in error, because the two messages to which the gentleman from Massachusetts has referred were referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and are pending there. They are not before the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MICHENER. That was the very purpose and the only way the purpose could be accomplished was by a constitutional amendment and that was the matter that was before the Judiciary Committee, but we were not permitted to proceed.

Mr. McCORMACK. In that respect, I have no controversy with the gentleman. A constitutional amendment, of course, would go to the Committee on the Judiciary; and if legislation was to be enacted, that would go to the Ways and Means Committee; but the President has always been consistent in his position that the interest on all such bonds-Federal, State, and local-should be taxed. I make this statement in view of the incorrect statements made this afternoon by some of our Republican colleagues, and in order that the record will be clear.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly, the Committee rose and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GAVAGAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the Committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5748) to amend the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, pursuant to House Resolution 200, he reported the same back to the House.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the engrossment and third reading of

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am, Mr. Speaker. The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Wolcott moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Wolcott), there were—ayes 54, noes 136.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken and the bill was passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who have spoken on the bill may have five legislative days in which to revise and extend their own remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, in connection with a revision and extension of my remarks I ask unanimous consent to include an article appearing in the Evening Star of today on this subject matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an article that appeared in the Sunday Post under the pen of Florence S. Kerr.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, after the legislative program of the day and following any previous special order heretofore entered, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAW-FORD], may address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have 20 minutes on Thursday next instead of the 30 minutes granted me today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include certain excerpts in connection with the remarks I made today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT AMENDMENTS, 1939

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I trust the Members who desire recognition to extend their remarks will wait for a few moments. It is desired on the part of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] to call up a conference report upon the bill (H. R. 5324) to amend the National Housing Act. I understand it is not controversial and that we may dispose of it in a few minutes.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I trust the gentleman will not press that motion. It is 5 o'clock. The conference report in question is controversial and will take time for discussion.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I understood the bill we just had under consideration was reported unanimously from the committee and was not controversial and would be disposed of in 30 or 40 minutes. I have been told today many times that this conference report is not controversial. If it is controversial, I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] that it go over. It must go over until Thursday next, if it is not taken up today.

Mr. STEAGALL. If it will accommodate the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Luce] and Members of the House, we will not endeavor to dispose of the conference report today. I had understood that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WILLIAMS] desired a brief time in which to discuss the report, and that there would not be opposition to the adoption of the report. I had understood that he voiced the views of those who are opposed to one of the provisions of the bill which has been amended and worked out in conference. If the gentleman from Massachusetts desires to discuss the bill at length, I shall not insist upon going ahead with the conference report this afternoon, but will let the matter go over until Thursday next.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the proceedings on the conference report just referred to on Thursday next that it may be in order for the Committee on Claims to call up omnibus claims bills.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and to include therein a short article from the New York Times of Monday, May 22, by Anna O'Hare McCormick, on the question of the battle of diplomats.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by including an article written by me and published in the New York Journal-

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include certain editorial comments in connection with the new pick-up service in air mail.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MICHAEL J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the Businessman and the President.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BARGAIN BASEMENT

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, as the merchant which he claimed to be last evening before the American Retail Federation, President Roosevelt certainly needs a bargain annex where he might dispose of his greatly worn and second-hand merchandise.

For example, among other items, he could most consistently place on his bargain counter and advertise "for sale" very cheaply:

(1) A repudiated A. A. A. scarcity farm program, with its parity price "bustline."

(2) A discarded and defective N. R. A.

(3) A gold-buying policy most leaky in its beneficence toward foreign nations.

(4) A fiscal policy full of holes.

- (5) An outmoded and inadequate monetary policy.
- (6) A completely run-down-at-the-heel abundance policy.

(7) An overswollen public debt.

(8) A moth-eaten unemployment paradox.

- (9) An economic program devoted to fine objectives but utterly fantastic, wholly crackpot, and completely indefensible in its evolution.
- (10) A cloak of labeled liberalism which should find ready sale in a bargain basement for its junk value as the most outstanding illustration of wholesale political hocus-pocus ever foisted upon the American public.

SUGAR ACREAGE

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I have placed on the Speaker's desk a discharge petition to bring Senate bill 69, known as the Ellender sugar-acreage bill, out of committee and before the House for consideration and a vote.

The bill was referred to the House Committee on Agriculture on March 24, where it was shelved despite continuous efforts on the part of Congressmen from sugar-producing States to appear before the committee in behalf of the bill.

The Ellender bill provides for an increase in the sugar acreage in the United States by 80,000 to 100,000 acres and would wipe out one of the most obvious shortcomings in our agriculture picture today. In brief, the bill would allow domestic growers to produce more than 30 percent of the sugar necessary to meet domestic consumption.

The Committee on Agriculture pigeonholed the bill in the face of a purported threat of Presidential veto. However, the President of the United States is explicitly given the power of Presidential veto. It is a power to be used at the proper time; namely, when the bill is presented to him for his signature or rejection.

However, it should not be the practice of Members of Congress to waylay legislation even though threatened by Presidential veto. It is the duty of this Congress to enact measures which it believes to be of the greatest benefit to the people of the United States. By no means should a threatened Presidential veto cause a committee of the House to place legislation in a lethal chamber.

We have been told that the enactment of the Ellender sugar-acreage bill would be a serious threat to the future of the policy of improved relationships among the American republics.

I believe in the good-neighbor policy. It is an idealistic procedure. But I do not believe in order to carry out that policy that we must give our good neighbors our clothes so that we have only a shirt in our economic wardrobe.

We must first be concerned with good neighbors within our own country. I do not believe that we must place people on relief, place them on the streets, in order that we may carry out our program of peace in the Western Hemisphere.

In the first place, the curtailment of domestic beet and cane acreage is not a sound business practice in view of the fact that we supply less than one-third of the amount of sugar we annually consume. It would be ruinous for any private business to operate on such a basis. It is likewise ruinous to our sugar-beet and cane interests if the Government continues curtailment along present lines.

Statistical data and reports placed in the Congressional Record on May 18 by Senator O'Mahoney, of Wyoming, point out clearly that the factor of improved relationships among the American republics in the present sugar program is ill founded. Our good neighbors do not profit from our curtailment, but rather the New York, New Jersey, and Canadian corporations which own the refineries in Cuba, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and other countries.

Ernest H. Gruening, head of the territorial division of the Department of the Interior, testified before the Appropriations Committee of the Senate during consideration of the second deficiency bill this session, that 2 years ago the largest Puerto Rico sugar benefit payment went to the Royal Bank in Canada, and the next largest payment went to the National City Bank of New York.

For years, the phrase, "The American market reserved for the American farmer," has been written into the national platforms of both the Democratic and Republican Parties. The Democratic platform of 1936 states:

We favor the production of all the market will absorb, both at home and abroad * * *.

I cite the plank from the Democratic platform because we members of the Democratic Party are in power and the responsibility of running the Government is ours, Today, I ask every Member of this House who believes in the benefits provided in the sugar-acreage bill to sign the discharge petition immediately. For both Republicans and Democrats, the signing of this petition is merely the application of our party principles. More than that, it is the application of our sound belief that the American market should be reserved for the American farmer. It is nothing short of good government.

It has been 128 years since John C. Calhoun, then a Member of the United States House of Representatives, said on the floor: "Protection and patriotism are reciprocal."

Any permanent government must give protection, full protection, to its people, if that government expects patriotism from its people. Calhoun's words are particularly applicable in our consideration of the sugar-acreage measure. We must spare no pains in giving our farmers, as well as every other class of persons, full protection. After a government has provided that protection, patriotism will be its reward.

THIRD TERM FOR PRESIDENT

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record at this point and to print therewith a letter from Thomas Jefferson to the Legislature of Vermont.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, the Honorable Joseph B. Shannon, of Missouri, is a profound student of the life, writings, and principles of Thomas Jefferson. In the selection of material for the erection of the Jefferson Memorial bids were submitted for Vermont and Georgia marble. Some discussion ensued as to the sentimental value of these two marbles, both very beautiful, for use in the erection of the majestic memorial arising to Jefferson on the Tidal Basin. This discussion ended happily by the selection of Vermont Imperial Danby marble for the exterior of the monument and the Georgia white for the interior. Both of these marbles are exquisite in coloring and blend harmoniously. In the course of the discussion the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON] called my attention to the fact that the Legislature of Vermont, at the close of Jefferson's second term, addressed a memorial to him requesting that he run for a third term. Mr. Shannon also calls attention to the fact that in 1800 Vermont elected the Sage of Monticello to the Presidency over Aaron Burr. He has kindly furnished me with a copy of Jefferson's reply to the Legislature of Vermont. It will be noted that Jefferson hails the principle set by Washington that no man should have more than two terms in the Presidency. Jefferson characterizes Washington's position as a "sound precedent set by an illustrious predecessor." The communication is of special value as it establishes the propriety of using, in part at least, Vermont marble in the construction of the glorious memorial designed by the late John Russell Pope. The communication follows:

WASHINGTON, December 10, 1807.

To the Legislature of Vermont:

To the Legislature of Vermont:

I received in due season the address of the Legislature of Vermont, bearing date the 5th of November, 1806, in which, with their approbation of the general course of my administration, they were so good as to express their desire that I would consent to be proposed again, to the public voice, on the expiration of my present term of office. Entertaining, as I do, for the Legislature of Vermont those sentiments of high respect which would have prompted an immediate answer, I was certain, nevertheless, they would approve a delay which had for its object to avoid a premature agitation of the public mind, on a subject so interesting as the election of a Chief Magistrate.

approve a delay which had for its object to avoid a premature agitation of the public mind, on a subject so interesting as the election of a Chief Magistrate.

That I should lay down my charge at a proper period, is as much a duty as to have borne it faithfully. If some termination to the services of the Chief Magistrate be not fixed by the Constitution, or supplied by practice, his office, nominally for years, will, in fact, become for life; and history shows how easily that degenerates into an inheritance. Believing that a representative government, responsible at short periods of election, is that which produces the greatest sum of happiness to mankind, I feel it a duty to do no act which shall essentially impair that principle; and I should unwillingly be the person who, disregarding the sound precedent set by an illustrious predecessor, should furnish the first example of prolongation beyond the second term of office.

Truth, also, requires me to add, that I am sensible of that decline which advancing years bring on; and feeling their physical, I ought not to doubt their mental effect. Happy if I am the first to perceive and to obey this admonition of nature, and to solicit a retreat from cares too great for the wearied faculties of age.

For the approbation which the Legislature of Vermont has been pleased to express of the principles the measures pursued in the management of their affairs, I am sincerely thankful; and should I be so fortunate as to carry into retirement the equal approbation and goodwill of my fellow citizens generally, it will be the comfort of my future days, and will close a service of 40 years with the only reward it ever wished.

Your obedient servant,

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

SHALL WE INVESTIGATE THE PHILIPPINE SITUATION?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, in view of the lateness of the hour, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, whether to withdraw immediately from our sovereignty and control of the Philippines, or to apply remedial measures to the situation rapidly developing there, so we may safely carry out the terms of the Philippine Independence Act of 1934 without jeopardizing our own peace, briefly stated, is the objective sought to be developed by the investigation of the Philippine situation proposed by my Resolution No. 198 which I introduced May 19.

Due to the highly inflammable situation which has been rapidly developing in the Far East during the past 2 years with the Japanese aggression there, trouble might break out for us at any moment. In fact, in my opinion, there is much more danger to us in the Orient, and of our being involved in war there, than in Europe. That being evident, I have made a very detailed study of the problem and offer my resolution in order to bring the facts of the matter forcibly to the attention of the House and of the people of the United States who are interested in preserving peace whether in Europe or in Asia.

I have been greatly encouraged, since the introduction of the resolution, by receiving letters, wires, cablegrams, and newspaper articles commending me for my proposal and offering aid and assistance in developing the information which will be needful if we are to institute a valuable and worth-while investigation. The first letter is typical of the others. It comes from a former Army officer now residing in Philadelphia, and is as follows:

I read in tonight's Philadelphia Evening Bulletin that you request an investigation of pro-Japanese activities of President Manuel Quezon of the Philippines. Having been a resident of the islands from 1899 to 1933, I am thoroughly familiar with affairs over there, knowing their language and having been in close contact with the governing classes. You should also include the Vice President, Sergio Osmena, who made several trips to Japan and was instrumental in the sale of lands on the island of Mindanao, to the Japs.

If I can be of any service to you, just call me.

The Washington Post on May 19, in a feature article, also discusses another angle of the problem—the desire on the part of President Quezon to start emasculating the newly framed and recently adopted Philippine Constitution. The article in a very capable manner describes the subtle movement now going on to throw out the constitutional provision prohibiting more than one 6-year term for the island president. As the article describes, an attempt is now being made so that Quezon can succeed himself, thus creating a complete dictatorship by perpetual holding of the office of president. The article is as follows:

> [From the Washington Post of May 19, 1939] NEW TERM FOR QUEZON (By Vicente Albano Pacis) THE PHILIPPINE REELECTION PROBLEM

It seems that after several years of quiet agitation for the reelection of President Manual L. Quezon, of the Philippine Commonwealth, in spite of the categorical prohibition of the Philippine Constitution, Philippine public opinion has been so crystallized that the matter is ready for presentation to Washington, where refusal to have the constitution amended will readily appear as an unmitigated act of thumbing down the Filipino people.

The boom for Mr. Quezon's reelection started soon after the inauguration of the Commonwealth, but Quezon himself threw cold water on it when he announced that he was not a candidate to succeed himself. It was almost definitely squelched when reports, never authoritatively denied, reached Manila to the effect that the Washington authorities frowned upon the idea of amending the never authoritatively defiled, reached Manila to the effect that the Washington authorities frowned upon the idea of amending the Philippine Constitution so soon, and especially for the benefit, at least apparently, of a single individual. When the reports became current in Manila, President Quezon even more categorically declared that he was not the least bit interested in another term.

At about this juncture a long-range program of expanding the Malacanan estate, the residence of the President, was started. It included the renovation and expansion of the palace, the conversion of a large area across the Pasig River into a park as part of the Presidential estate, and the construction of various outhouses, inresidential estate, and the construction of various outhouses, in-cluding the guest houses, playgrounds, and a massive garage, which at this writing is about to be completed. One day one of the political leaders with Presidential aspirations was a Malacanan luncheon guest, and, being more or less in intimate relations with the President, ventured to fish.

"Judging from the permanent improvements you are carrying out here." he remarked with a twinkle in his eyes, "it looks as if you intend to stay here very long."

The President, who holds the championship record in the islands for his ability to get out of tight spots, simply replied, "I am preparing all this for you fellows who will come after me."

The Philippine Constitution expressly prohibits the reelection of the President, but gives him a term of 6 years. This feature was pointed to at the time of the drafting of the constitution as an improvement over the American Constitution. It was explained that a chief executive invariably looks forward to a second term, and in doing so utilizes the latter half of his first term for mending his political fences. The Philippine President from politics.

Following the spirit of this prohibition, President Quezon soon

Following the spirit of this prohibition, President Quezon soon after his inauguration announced his retirement from politics. He placed himself outside of his party and refused to meddle in the election held 2 years after his inauguration for Provincial and municipal officials. When, late last year, the election for members of the assembly was held, however, he openly participated in the campaign on the excuse that he was interested in getting a legislative body that would cooperate with the executive. In effect, a 100-percent Quezon assembly was elected.

Since the assembly has always been called a Quezon assembly, its leaders, Speaker Yulo and Floor Leader Paredes, have announced that it will not take the complete initiative to amend the constitution. The constitution provides that it may be amended by the assembly or by a constituent convention called by the assembly for the purpose, the proposed amendment in either case to be approved or disapproved at a referendum to take place during a regular elec-tion. The only general election to take place before the Presidential term expires is that for provincial and municipal officials in 1940. Before then the convention must be called and the amendment proposed. It is predicted that the proposed amendments will eventually multiply to include the establishment of a senate, thus also discarding the unicameralism which, at the time the President of the United States was to act on the constitution, was also pointed out as one more improvement over other constitutions.

Arguments for President Quezon's reelection are that the people demand it generally; that the years 1942-48 will be the most critical period of the Commonwealth, since the American export taxes will be applied on Philippine products; that the constitutional prohibi-tion is a sort of "squinting" provision, meant more for the period of the republic, since it provides for 6-year terms, whereas the remaining Commonwealth term is only for 4 years; that Quezon is admittedly the best Filipino leader and must therefore be mustered in when the country cannot afford to take chances. The open and systematic campaign for Quezon's reelection was started by Messrs. Yule and Paredes and the DMHM newspapers, a syndicate friendly Arguments advanced against Quezon's reelection are that to do so would be to admit that the Filipinos lack tried and experienced leaders; that to amend the constitution for Quezon would be to predicate such a fundamental popular act on a single person; that to do so would be to interrupt the development of Philippine constitutionalism; that it will constitute a bad and dangerous precedent, giving a President a means to perpetuate himself in power.

It is the situation described in the above article that moves the editor of the monthly magazine, the Philippine American Advocate to ask:

Why worry about Hitler and Mussolini when we have Quezon * * under the American flag?

Two years ago an account was published of Quezon's visit to Hitler in Germany. In 1939 he is the guest of Japan at a state banquet.

A ranking Republican Member of the House Committee on Insular Affairs, Representative Crawford of Michigan, has already told us that economic and racial understandings were steadily "leading to Japanese control of the Philippines."

The Philippine anti-Fascist organization warns us of a now pending danger that the Philippines are "coming under the savage heel of Japanese militarism."

The Far East correspondents of both the New York Times and the New York Herald Tribune have repeatedly warned us of conditions that demand the prompt attention of Congress.

Can this country in honor to its own flag let the Philippine problem drift-and make the conquest of this people easy?

We are greatly concerned over the Japanese aggression in Manchuria and China. Our daily mail with our newspapers, magazines, and periodicals are all full of articles denouncing Japan. Our pulpits and public platforms have been the spot from which much burning oratory has emanated during the past 2 years demanding action against Japan. We are already applying measures of coercion and punishment because of our disapproval of the action of this aggressor in China. But we little realize that similar action as far as taking over the country, its business, and governmental activities has been taking place under our very eyes in the Philippines. We have no more than a friendly and a business interest in China. In the Philippines we are much more vitally and personally interested. We are the government there. It is still our dependency. It is an integral part of the United States. And still we are almost ready to go to war over the situation in China, a foreign land, while we let Japan take over the territorial possessions of the United States. The disclosures which I anticipate will be developed in this proposed investigation will show startling facts and details of this situation.

I think we need to approach this task in the sense of not only a businesslike investigation, but also of the value and benefit such an activity can be in the promotion of our more complete undertaking and education in the part this eastern situation has, not only in relation to our American ideals and government, but also to the welfare and safety of the Philippine people themselves. I believe I voice the desire of this Congress and of the American people when I say that. want to solve the Philippine problem in fairness to all. We want to solve it just as we wish with fairness and justice to solve our domestic problems.

EUROPEAN MESS INVOLVES ORIENT

We all know Europe is in a mess as pointed out in my address here May 9, entitled, "The Only Road to Peace." We are jittery about the highly inflammable situation there. And well may we be! I do not mean we will be directly involved there. I do not believe we will be drawn into another European War, as I pointed out in my interview last week with the Hearst press. But the minute this thing breaks in Europe, Japan will start pushing her objectives much more rapidly in the Orient. Not only will the attempt be made to completely subjugate China, but the International settlement at Shanghai will be obliterated, as recent Japanese activities indicate; Hongkong will be next in line, then Singapore, as I pointed out on February 22, in my remarks on the Guam problem; then the Dutch East Indies and the American Philippines. It may take 2 years. I doubt if it will take longer for these developments.

WHAT WILL THEN BE OUR PROBLEM?

It will be to determine whether to surrender to the Japanese and their intense ambition to promote their ideals, and ways of life, of culture, and religion, or whether to take America's traditional stand against aggression and against the fallacious theory that might makes right. In either event and whatever our decision may be, it is important that we act now before such a dilemma confronts us, before we are faced with a crisis, when sound reason and cool logic will be thrown out the window by the forces of hate, greed, self-ishness, and passion, aroused under the strain of such a conflict as I have visualized.

M'NUTT SUGGESTS INVESTIGATION

America's great and good citizen, the present High Commissioner to the Philippines, Paul V. McNutt, former National Commander of the American Legion, knew this when he said recently, I quote: "Without too great a loss of time and with the cooperation of the leaders among the Filipinos, we should proceed to a realistic reexamination of the needs of these people, and of the long-range interest of ourselves. The enduring welfare and safety of both countries are the paramount consideration."

I said a moment ago it is important that we make an immediate decision as to our future there, after careful public investigation of the problem; for, whether we surrender to Japan or whether we stand our ground, this determination, it seems to me, is highly important. If we are to surrender, we can save our face by withdrawing now. If we are to stand our ground, there is much work of a preparatory and remedial nature needing to be done in order to prevent internal disloyalty and treachery from undermining our position, both on the part of the Japanese concentrations there as well as on the part of certain pro-Japanese and anti-American Filipino officials.

Now, there are many ramifications of this problem and its effects on the national life of this Nation. There is a great mass of good argument for immediate withdrawal from our overlordship of the islands. It is said that 95 percent of our people are for such a thing. This is undoubtedly the casenot alone because of their desire to protect and promote peace. but also because of the competition which the islands give our industry, commerce, and agriculture because of our arrangement letting their products in here duty-free. Two very important items which especially affect the welfare of my own region are sugar and hemp products, such as rope and binder twine. Our Minnesota rope and twine factory is, like all others in this country, operating about 50 percent of capacity because of this foreign competition, and is also operating at heavy annual losses. When these factories have been completely routed and put out of business because of this duty-free, cheap, oriental labor competition, then the international Rope and Binder Twine Trust, having a complete monopoly, can double the price to suit themselves and make up for present losses, thus taking another slice from our farmers' already meager income from wheat, barley, oats, rye, and such important small grains. Japanese farmers in the Philippines' richest province, Davao, now grow and sell the most of the world's best hemp.

Then, on the other side of the picture, the United States, Mr. Speaker, has a stake in the Philippines—a greater stake than in any other territorial possessions outside of the mainland of North America.

In the past 40 years our total Government investment in good government and in economic and social advancement of the Philippines is estimated at $700,000,000. We even hold $45,000,000 in Philippine government bonds. Are we going to surrender meekly the results of our 40-year administration to the "Machiavelli of the Orient"?

American industrial investment in the Philippines is placed at $140,000,000. Sugar, oil, timber, chromium—are we going to deliver this American investment also to build up the war power of Japan? Shall the 16,000,000 people of the Philippines go as Manchukuo, Shanghai, Peiping, and the entire seaboard of China?

The Philippines are the seventh largest of our export markets oversea. Our total annual commerce with the people to whom $840,000,000 of Government investment and American private capital has gone is today worth near $200,000,000. Shall that go to Japan, as the tail goes with the hide?

We have a stake in American life and liberty in the Philippines—the lives and liberty of American citizens resident there and doing business there, teachers in the schools, workers in social uplift, workers in government and in business. The magnificent highways and other public works of that island empire are largely the product of American engineers and investors. Shall we haul down the American flag and help raise that of Japan?

That was not the spirit of the United States on May 1, 1898, when Dewey destroyed the Spanish Fleet in Manila Bay.

Mr. Speaker, we not only have a national stake in the Philippines, but we have a national duty. As all know, the Philippines, under the Independence Act of 1934—the Tydings-McDuffie Act, passed by Congress and signed by President Roosevelt March 24, 1934—are the largest territorial affiliate of the United States outside of the American Continent. Until 1946, the Philippines are under the flag and Constitution of the United States and under the administration and Congress of the United States—and lawfully entitled to our responsible sovereign protection.

Thus our stake in the Philippines bears the stamp, not only of national interest, but of national duty. It is a duty which cannot with honor or even national safety be neglected, disregarded, overlooked, or shirked. We have a duty there as we have in any other territory over which our laws and our Stars and Stripes prevail.

And that American stake in the Philippines today is threatened. It is under the menace of a foreign power, as it was in 1898, over 40 years ago. It is under the menace of a foreign power which in ruthless warfare in China during the past 2 years, after these trying months of bloody conquest, can set up no valid claim to humanitarian superiority over the rule of conquering Spain prior to 1898.

This Congress does not need to be told of the steady encroachments of the Japanese power in the Philippines during recent years. So strong is Jap influence in the Philippines today that the pro-Japanese faction cannot wait until the expiration of the Independence Act in 1946 and demands a so-called "plebiscite"—the Hitler method of controlled elections—in order to quicken the Japanese conquest of the Philippines! So the question becomes, Shall we let them have it now or wait till 1946?

There is no question, Mr. Speaker, that the Seventy-sixth Congress, representing the 130,000,000 people of the 48 States, desire, without regard to party lines, to do the fair and just thing for the people of the Philippines and the wise and honorable thing for the greatest democracy on earth.

But no one will deny that we cannot do the wise, just, and honorable thing unless we know, by impartial and first-hand investigation, what the conditions are that confront the Philippines and the United States.

The only sure way to get our factual foundation is to send there our own Representatives, hold hearings, mingle with the people, study the industrial conditions, the property and labor, the institutions and the Government, and build from the ground up an up-to-date foundation of industrial, social, political, and governmental knowledge of vital problems.

This investigation should be free and impartial. But there are three questions that will command earnest attention in view of the events of the past year and up to the present hour:

1. Is the Japanese conquest of China an all-Asia march of conquest, and does it threaten, as charged, the Philippines?

2. What is the extent of Japanese economic encroachment in the Philippines—land ownership, industrial and shipping control, and Japanese immigration—and is it the entering wedge to complete Japanese control?

3. How great is the extent of Japanese influence over the present government of the Philippines, the executive and legislative power, the appointment of Japanese-minded administrators, the Japanese power over the political machine and the electorate? How long would it be after American evacuation that the Philippines could maintain their independence against the Japanese conquerors of China?

It must be remembered that, although 4,000,000 Filipinos today are able to read the English language, they cannot know the truth when freedom of the press and freedom of assembly is under the control of a Jap-minded governmental machine.

What do they understand of the trend now in progress, if their chief contact with it is through pro-Jap interests and influences? The smooth policy of fooling the people by smiling assurances has become a Japanese fine art. And the Japs favor a new plebiscite. They are "for the people" against the United States of America.

The Japs demand for the Philippines a plebiscite—the Hitler reform program—first, to hasten the hour when America no longer can protect Philippine territory; second, to uproot the $840,000,000 American financial stake in the Philippines; third, to divert from the United States to Japan a commerce valued at near $200,000,000 annually, and, furthermore, to undermine the American Government stake in $45,000,000 invested in United States guaranteed Philippine Government bonds.

The Japs may want a plebiscite for another reason, namely, to insure Japan a complete Machiavelli dynasty over the Pacific coast of Asia. Control of all harbors and commercial ports, control of all developed western Asian resources and industries, control of mineral resources, food resources, and, above all, control of an enslaved Filipino working population—such as Japan has visited upon their subjects, both in Korea and in Manchukuo and now in China.

It is highly significant that the old warrior for Philippine independence—Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo—is opposed to holding the plebiscite. Head of the Veterans of the Philippine Revolution, a leader as true to Philippine liberty as George Washington to the American cause—Aguinaldo wired the United States Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, March 15:

We strongly protest against a new plebiscite. The conditions in the Far East do not alter the stand of the Filipinos for independence.

What "conditions in the Far East" did General Aguinaldo have in mind? The answer is plain. The war of Japanese conquest, which lacks only one important post to make Pacific Asia a "closed shop" with complete embargo against entrance of any civilized country into the commerce and enlightened development of the 600,000,000 souls in eastern Asia.

All that Japan now needs to perfect its "encirclement" is the control of the Philippines. Its "closed shop" would then be an accomplished fact. Shall the Seventy-sixth Congress, by closing its eyes, give Japan its "closed shop" by neglect to inform itself of the "conditions" now apparent to such patriots as General Aguinaldo?

There is yet another stake which the United States holds in the Philippines—and that is the safety of the Pacific coast of North America.

If our western territorial frontier—the Philippine Archipelago—is taken over by Japan and bulwarked as a Jap foundation for control of the Pacific, what is the status of Hawaii, of all other American possessions in the Pacific, and what of the safety of our Pacific States on the mainland?

With the Philippines in possession of the Jap military power, and all west of Hawaii commanded by Jap battle-ships, the Pacific Fleet of the United States is relegated to a very humble and restricted field subject to the military will of Japan. If we by neglect permit this thing to happen to the Philippines, what becomes of American prestige on the Pacific?

Lincoln said: "This country cannot endure half slave and half free." Were he alive today he might well say: "American prestige in the Pacific cannot exist half Jap and the rest half-breed."

If the Hitler-Mussolini "axis" is extended to the Japanese dominions in Asia, and even to the Japanese foundation in future control of the Philippines, our entire Pacific coast, from Alaska down, will be subject to future invasion.

Had not Thomas Jefferson secured control of the great empire of the Central West, through the Louisiana Purchase, the United States had no security against the day when British control of the Mississippi from the Gulf to the Great Lakes would endanger the existence of the Republic.

In Jefferson's day the Mississippi country was our western frontier. Today that frontier has moved westward. Shall we, by negligence, leave the gate unlocked for Japanese power to make successful entry here?

The appropriation suggested for this survey by Congress is $100,000. That happens to be an expense of $1 for each $450 we have invested in Philippine Government bonds, and $1 for each $8,400 we have invested altogether in the Philippines. Simply as a matter of "dirt cheap" insurance, without regard to national interests involved which are great, as I will point out later in more detail, our survey should not be delayed.

We cannot let matters drift and then plead ignorance when the coup is sprung. Neglect of national duty is no "appeasement" in dealing with the "Machiavelli of the Pacific". The time would seem to be at hand. Otherwise General Aguinaldo would not have cabled Congress—"We protest."

He wants no "plebiscite," because he knows present conditions in the "Far East." It is up to Congress to know those conditions, even as Aguinaldo knows them. His stake is freedom for the Philippines. Our stake is freedom for the Pacific and safety for the United States of America.

Our weakest place as a nation charged with protection of life and liberty in the Western Hemisphere is undoubtedly in the Philippines—almost under the guns of Japanese battleships—6,000 miles west of San Francisco.

Oliver Wendell Holmes told us in the old poem, the "One-Hoss Shay", that the way to fix the weakest place was to "make it as strong as the rest." At least, we should take a look at it, that we may not find it missing.

When Filipino leaders call upon Congress, and, in the name of liberty, ask us to preserve what is left of freedom in the Philippines, the time would seem to be ripe to act. Had the signers of the Declaration of Independence, July 4, 1776, delayed action another year, what would have happened to American history?

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, MAY 24, 1939

(Legislative day of Friday, May 19, 1939)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Z@Barney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Master of men, serene Son of God, in whose hands alone are the keys of self-knowledge and self-mastery, control us with the majesty of Thy calm that faith and perfect trust in Thee may supplant our fear and our disquietude as we look out upon our world today. Thou, O Christ, hast given to the facts of human life divine significance, with personal instinct regnant everywhere; help us, therefore, to bring such character to our work as shall transmit truth to men, that, gathering the light that lies above the stars, we may lay it in clear, soft rays upon their daily life so that they may not be in darkness.

O Thou whose voice becalmed the troubled waters in the long ago, abide with our brave sons imperiled in the deep and direct with the spirit of wisdom the appointed means of rescue, that they may speedily be restored to their dear ones who keep love's holy vigil and for whom are the constant prayers and sympathy of a united people. In Thy name we ask it. Amen.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following memorial of the Legislature of Florida, which was referred to the Committee on the Library:

House Memorial 8

Memorial to the Congress of the United States requesting the Federal Government to change the name of Fort Marion National Monu-ment to Castillo de San Marcos National Monument, the latter name being more indicative of the historical name and significance of the ancient fortification

Whereas Fort Marion National Monument was built by the Spanish as a bulwark and defense against the English and its chief historic significance is the part it played in protecting Florida against English invasions:

Whereas Fort Marion National Monument is situate in St. Augustine, the first permanent white settlement in the United States, which is one of the few remnants left of the Spanish Empire in the Southeastern United States;

Whereas Fort Marion National Monument carried the title of "Castillo de San Marcos" or its English equivalent, "Castle St. Marks," from 1672 to 1821, or a period of 149 years;
Whereas the name "Castillo de San Marcos" was changed to Fort Marion as late as January 7, 1825, when an order was issued from The Adjutant General's office of the United States Army that such a change be made to honor the memory of Gen. Francis Marion, Revolutionary hero of the American Colonies;
Whereas the name "Fort Marion" seems inappropriate inasmuch as the illustrious American, Gen. Francis Marion, played no part in the history of Castillo de San Marcos or of Florida, and it is extremely doubtful that he ever visited the fort; doubtful that he ever visited the fort;

LXXXIV-382

Whereas it is somewhat ironical that the fort which now bears the name of Gen. Francis Marion was in reality headquarters for British troops operating against Francis Marion and his command; Whereas there is a strong agitation both in the State and in the various parts of the United States that the incongruity of naming a Spanish citadel after an American be remedied;

Whereas the changing of the name back to its original Spanish designation is in accord with the proposal of the St. Augustine Historical Preservation and Restoration Association, which was formed with the intent of preserving historical structures in the city of St. Augustine and in restoring to the American people a rich heritage possessing great patriotic, educational, and inspirational values; Whereas said St. Augustine Historical Preservation and Restoration Association's program is of deep interest to the Carnegie Institution of Washington, the United States National Park Service, the St. Augustine Historical Society, and Institute of Science, the State St. Augustine Historical Society and Institute of Science, the State of Florida, the City Commission of St. Augustine, the Honorable John Merriam, former president of the Carnegie Institution of Washington, and former United States Senator Scott M. Loftin, together with many other distinguished persons, organizations, and their associations;

Whereas such outstanding patriotic and civic clubs as Maria Jefferson Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution, the St. Augustine Chapter of the Pilot Club, the St. Augustine Kiwanis Club, the St. Augustine Business and Professional Men's Association, all favor the proposed change in the name of the fort;

Whereas the change in name is in keeping with the plan the city of St. Augustine is attempting to establish, along with other abovementioned societies and associations and men, a cultural Pan-American center in the city of St. Augustine, Fla., an institution of learning, history, and the perpetuation of Pan-American culture, and is desirous of retaining original Spanish names for outstanding remains of Spanish occupations;

Whereas the City Commission of the city of St. Augustine is likewise interested in preserving the Spanish type of architecture and the Spanish names of streets and buildings in the city, and desires that the official name of the fort be changed to its original name of

Costillo de San Marcos;

Whereas the National Park Service is in possession of a petition signed by the descendants and relatives of families residing in St. Augustine prior to 1821, which requests that the fort now named Fort Marion be renamed Castillo de San Marcos, about 200 names of well-known families being contained within said petition;

Whereas the name "Castillo de San Marcos," or its English equivalents of Castle St. Mark, Fort San Marcos, is still in general use;

Whereas of all the histories pertaining to the fort, there are few, if any, that ignore the Spanish name. Some refer to it as Fort San Marcos, Castle San Marcos, or the exact Spanish of Castillo de San Marcos. A History of Florida, by Margaret Fairlie, which is the textbook used by the public schools of Florida, shows a picture of the fort which is entitled "Fort San Marcos";

Whereas the National Park Service in its signboards and information leaflets is forced to use the name "Castillo de San Marcos" in parentheses after the name "Fort Marion" to explain the change of names, for even the most casual visitor knows that the name "Fort Marion" is not Spanish;

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution of the Council of State Governments, Chicago, Ill., favoring the enactment of legislation to provide that standard containers be used in interstate commerce (not now required by law), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry

He also laid before the Senate a resolution of the Washington Osteopathic Association, favoring the amendment of Senate bill 1620, the so-called national health bill, so as to preserve the freedom of choice of the physician and school of practice to persons entitled to medical care and providing osteopathic representation on Federal and State advisory councils, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also laid before the Senate a petition of sundry citizens of Sarasota, Fla., praying that action be taken to stop the shipment of munitions and war supplies to Japan for use in operations in China, and also making reference to other questions of foreign policy, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WALSH presented a telegram, signed by Harold M. Cohen, secretary, embodying a resolution adopted by the Jewish community of Brockton, Mass., in meeting assembled, protesting against abandonment on the part of the British Government of its former policy relating to the Palestine mandate with special reference to the establishment of a Jewish National Home in Palestine, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WALSH also presented the following resolutions of the General Court of Massachusetts, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

JEWISH NATIONAL HOME IN PALESTINE

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD and appropriately referred, a communication which I have just received from hundreds of people in my State.

The statement is a plea for the assistance of the American people and officers of Government, as the signers of the statement seek to preserve the Jewish National Home in Palestine.

I am deeply in sympathy with the plight of the Jews in Palestine and with the efforts of their racial kinsfolk here. Like so many other Members of Congress, I have urged President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull, both of whom sympathize with the Jews, to do everything consistently proper and possible in an effort to relieve the anxiety and heartaches of these sad people.

There being no objection, the statement was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

printed in the Record, as follows:

The Honorable Francis T. Maloney,

United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

Dear Senators: We, the undersigned American citizens of Jewish descent, beg and implore you to use your good offices in defense of the continued existence of the Jewish national homeland in Palestine, which is threatened at this time by the recent White Paper issued by the British Government.

This document and the action it contemplates is tantamount to the annulment of spirit and letter of the Balfour declaration proclaimed by His Majesty's Government on November 2, 1917, and incorporated in the mandate for Palestine by the League of Nations.

This desceration of international morality is contrary to the ideals of fair play and decency which we as Americans consider to be the very core of Americanism. Coming as it does, in this critical moment of Jewish history, when hundreds of thousands of refugees wander the earth in search of a haven of refuge, this blow will mean the continued torture of innocent souls who, through no fault of their own, have been cast out of the lands of their birth and clamor for entry into their homeland, which was promised to them "of right and not on sufferance." them "of right and not on sufferance."

The arrival of the Jew in Palestine has meant untold benefits to the land and its inhabitants. In the 20 years of Jewish endeavor the country has been converted from an arid desert into a produc-

the country has been converted from an arid desert into a productive land. Modern methods of land cultivation, business, education, and sanitation have been introduced. From these the inhabitants of the land have derived a higher standard of living.

The American people and the Government of the United States have more than moral interest in this problem. The War President of the United States, Mr. Woodrow Wilson, and many other officials were consulted and were instrumental in the issuance of officials were consulted and were instrumental in the issuance of the Balfour declaration. The United States Senate unanimously adopted a resolution sanctioning the mandate for Palestine and consenting to Great Britain as the mandatory power over Palestine. In the American-British Convention signed between the two above-mentioned Governments in 1924 it was clearly understood and explicitly stated that no change is to be made in the mandate without consultation with and the consent of our Government ernment.

American participation in the formulation of the Balfour dec-laration and the mandate encouraged us to believe that these were no mere scraps of paper but the plighted word of great and noble Governments. In good faith we invested our energy and our wealth to make of a centuries-old dream a reality.

PREVENTIVE AND CURATIVE MEDICINE-LETTER FROM DR. EUGENE P. PENDERGRASS

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor an important letter which I have received from Dr. Eugene P. Pendergrass, professor of radiology in the University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, under date of May 23, 1939.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Hospital of the University of Pennsylvania. Department of radiology: Henry K. Pancoast, M. D., professor; Eugene P. Pendergrass, M. D., professor. Associates: George W. Chamberlin, M. D., Philip J. Hodes, M. D.]

UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA, Philadelphia, May 23, 1939.

Hon. JAMES J. DAVIS.

Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Dear Senator Davis: I want to thank you for your letter of May 4. Since that time I have collected some data to supply you which I am sending you under separate cover. In addition, the following comments bear on the statement that "the American people are receiving all the preventive and curative medicine they are willing to accept."

Reports by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. on its millions of industrial policyholders show 1938 to have been the healthiest year from a mortality standpoint of any year in the history of this country.

Among a selected risk of able-bodied men the morbidity reports of the United States Army showed an average of 8.6 days sickness per man in 1935. In 1934 industrial employees, from sickness and accident causing disability for 1 week or more, lost only 3.9 days per man. In a survey by the United States Public Health Service among 39,000 people, 40 percent of whom were children, there were 516 cases of illness, including accidents and pregnancies, per 1,000 men, women, and children. For the same year, 1935, the Army had a record of 585 cases of illness per 1,000 officers and men.

In a census of 6,245 children between the ages of 6 months and 15 years Metropolitan Insurance Co. found but 1,496 of them protected against diphtheria. Diphtheria immunization is free Among a selected risk of able-bodied men the morbidity reports 15 years Metropolitan Insurance Co. found but 1,496 of them protected against diphtheria. Diphtheria immunization is free everywhere for those who cannot pay.

The average life span in the United States is about 62 years compared with 61 years in England, 61 in Germany before the annexation of Austria, 55 in Italy, and even less elsewhere except in the Scandinavian countries. Several Commonwealths in the United States have records fully as favorable as the Scandinavian nations, with which they compare in land area and density of nations with which they compare in land area and density of nations with which they compare in land area and density of population.

The general death rate is lower in the United States than in any of the great powers of Europe. For 1935 the most recent year for which extensive data are available, the death rate per 1,000 population in the United States was 10.9 against 11.8 in Germany, 11.7 in England and Wales, 13.6 in Austria, 15.7 in France, and 13.9 in Italy. For 1935 the infant death rate was 56 per 1,000 births in the United States, 57 in England, 68 in Germany, 60 in France, 100 in Austria, and 101 in Italy. Sharp improvement has taken place in these rates in the United States since 1935 but evidence of similar improvement abroad is lacking. With respect to communicable diseases the United States enjoys an even greater advantage. From dibtheria, for example, the

With respect to communicable diseases the United States enjoys an even greater advantage. From diphtheria, for example, the death rate per 100,000 population in the United States in 1935 was 3.3 against a rate of 5 in France, 6.7 in Italy, 9.7 in Germany 10.1 in England and Wales, and 14.9 in Austria. The prevalence rate of diphtheria during the first 6 months of 1938 was only 9 per 100,000 people in the United States against 23 in France, 29 in Italy, 80 in England, and 85 in Germany. For tuberculosis, the mortality rates are about 56 in the United States, 72 in Germany, 76 in England and Wales, 90 in Italy, 110 in Austria, and 125 in France.

In July 1938, through the press and radio, the Medical Society of the State of New Jersey invited anyone in the State with the need of medical care and unable to obtain it to apply to the executive offices of the society. Less than 150 inquiries were received out of a population of 4,000,000; an investigation reveals that most of these were chronic neurasthenics or simply did not know how to go about securing free medical care which was already available to them.

The National Health Survey conducted last year by the United States Public Health Service revealed that among those earning $3,000 a year or more, 17 percent of the people with disabling illnesses did not seek a doctor's care. These people could afford medical care; they didn't want it. The simple fact is that the peculiarities of our simian civilization cause people to prefer cigarettes, cosmetics, and candy to medical care, even when they need it.

Facts revealed by the study of the committee on the cost of racts revealed by the study of the committee on the cost of medical care have become so well known that they have almost lost their pungent meaning. In 1929 the American people spent $3,656,000,000 for all forms of medical service, including those services purchased through taxes and other community funds In the same year we spent $5,807,000,000 for tobacco, toilet articles and recreation. What better proof is there that the American people are receiving all the preventive and curative medicine they are willing to receive? are willing to receive?

Another interesting feature is that I have a practice that consists of a number of well-to-do patients, and it is surprising to note how often patients who have no trouble whatever with finances put off going to see a doctor, oftentimes until it is too

The problem, I believe, is largely one of education and not existing facilities.

Very truly yours,

EUGENE P. PENDERGRASS, M. D.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE FRANK P. WALSH

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, a few days ago there died in the city of New York a very eminent and distinguished former citizen of the State of Missouri who at the time of his death was a very prominent and useful official of the State of New York. He was also a former Federal official whose services had been gratefully remembered by several Presidents. I refer to the Honorable Frank P. Walsh, of Kansas City.

After Mr. Walsh's death there was inserted in the minutes of the Power Authority of the State of New York, of which he was then chairman, a minute expressing their regret at his death, including an editorial from a New York newspaper as to the great value of his services. I ask unanimous consent that the minutes from the New York Power Authority be inserted in the Congressional Record.

The Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] intended to make this request, but at the moment he happens to be unavoidably absent on official business of the Senate, and I make the request jointly on behalf of the Senator from New York and myself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FRANK P. WALSH, 1864-1939

Frank P. Walsh, chairman of the Power Authority since its creation in 1931, died on May 2, 1939, in New York City.

His untimely passing was a deep personal loss to each of his colleagues of the power authority, as it was also an irreparable loss to the people of the State and Nation, whom he so loyally and steadfastly served throughout his lifetime. His leadership as colleagues of the power authority, as it was also an irreparable

The trustees feel that the editorial published on May 3, 1939, in the Watertown (N. Y.) Times expresses so completely their appreciation of the life and work of Mr. Walsh that they have adopted it as their own and reprint it here.

[From the Watertown (N. Y.) Times of May 3, 1939] THE LATE MR. FRANK P. WALSH

Mr. Frank P. Walsh died suddenly, just as he would have wished the end to come. He worked with enthusiasm and consuming passion through to his last day on earth. Few Americans of his time fought more valiantly than he in behalf of a triumph for human rights. He was the public defender always. He espoused unpopular causes. His spirit burned with an unquenchable flame to contribute to the establishment of justice. He was unafraid. Criticism never dismayed him. He went his course undisturbed by what people said about his positions. No one can read the story of his life without admiration for his consistent work in behalf of the unfortunate and the downtrodden. behalf of the unfortunate and the downtrodden.

He was a loyal friend of northern New York. This locality has lost in his passing a most valuable advocate. He battled for our seaway for years. He had faith in this section. He came here frequently, especially during the last years of the life of Delos M. Cosgrove, that other stanch advocate of justice for the average man and his cause.

As chairman of the Power Authority of the State of New York, he performed one of the outstanding services of his valuable public career. He assumed a leadership of the movement to curb the public utilities and he carried through that leadership so wisely and with such intelligence that the rate payers of the State profited to the extent of millions of dollars in reduced charges. His leadership in this field resulted in the passage of our municipal power bill, which makes it possible to establish municipal power districts. He led us to the very point of victory in the St. Lawrence seaway fight. The State at large has lost a most valuable public servant and this immediate locality a loyal friend.

and this immediate locality a loyal friend.

Mr. Walsh's career readily lends itself to division into three epochs or phases. There was his boyhood and youth and young manhood in Missouri. His environment there was conducive to broad development. It was the post-war Missouri of seething activity and thought common to a western border State. He came to know thoroughly men and their motives, their reactions, and their conceptions of justice. He traveled about the State trying cases in the circuit courts. He had his beginnings in the environment of human relationships that brought out a Mark Twain, a Joseph Pulitzer, a Senator Vest, a Carl Schurz, a Francis P. Blair, a Champ Clark. It was a battling State, and across the State line was Kansas, with Senator Ingalls and his group, a State built by former Union soldiers and still reverberating with the requiem song about Old John Brown. This was the environment that created Frank Walsh and contributed to make him great.

Then followed the second phase of his career when he went to

Then followed the second phase of his career when he went to Kansas City, established his home there, entered deeply into civic affairs, became recognized as a great trial lawyer, and won, after three trials, one of the most interesting and stubbornly fought murder cases that State has ever known. In spite of the fact that he at one time conducted an opposition newspaper, he became the attorney of William R. Nelson, the militant editor of the Kansas City Star.

The third phase was his service in the East. He came to New York about 20 years ago and opened offices there, although his service was country-wide. He helped Woodrow Wilson in his conception of new freedom; he fought for an Irish free state; he was the first attorney actually to open wide the careers of the so-called trust magnates through Federal investigation. He was Tom Mooney's lawyer for 20 years or more and without fee, even paying his own expenses, and when Mooney actually won freedom and wired Walsh, inviting him to come to California and see the prison gates swing open to release him, Walsh said he rejoiced in his release but was too busy to make the trip across the continent at that time.

He was the progressive and the liberal always, fighting for justice for working people; heading a great organization favoring the child-labor amendment; battling for loyalist Spain: participating in the organization of a national guild of attorneys as a protest against some of the bar associations. He became the first president of that guild, and when it would not speak out against communism and other "isms," he promptly resigned his membership—this in spite of his militant defense of some radical thinkers when he felt they were not getting justice.

His career was one of exceptional accomplishment, unsullied by deviation of any kind from the path of unselfish devotion to causes to establish what he felt was justice and right. He was never quarrelsome; he did not fight out his cases in personal argument. He moved about in an atmosphere of rare, progressive thought. Personal gain or prominence were never the slightest consideration or motive with him. His life and his work, his unflinching advocacy and defense of his ideals, provide rich example for any young man starting a career today and for any more mature person who seeks sustaining courage in the example of others. He fought up to the last day, traveling up and down America by airplane, tireless and apparently inexhaustible in his physical strength when he was well over three score years and ten. He lived adventurously yet unafraid, and he leaves a rich legacy of courageous, intelligent, consistent aggressiveness in behalf of the underprivileged, the misunderstood, the inarticulate.

REGULATION OF MODES OF TRANSPORTATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2009) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by extending its application to additional types of carriers and transportation and modifying certain provisions thereof, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. When the Senate took a recess yesterday it had completed the consideration of all committee amendments to the then pending bill except those that had been passed over by unanimous consent. The clerk will now state the first amendment passed over.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 49, line 2, after the word "premises", it is proposed to insert:

Provided further, That upon complaint or upon its own initiative, after full hearing, if the Commission finds that it will be in the interest of better service to the public or economy in operation, the Commission shall by order require common carriers by railroad subject to this act to handle their less-than-carload freight, including traffic now handled by express companies or freight forwarding companies which assume common-carrier liability, through an agency or agencies created and owned by all such carriers or groups of carriers, subject to such rules, regulations, and divisions of earnings among the participating carriers as may be agreed upon by such carriers, or in default of agreement as the Commission may find to be just and reasonable. Such agencies are hereby made common carriers subject to the provisions of this act. Any employee of such carrier or carriers displaced by such change of operation shall be subject to the so-called Washington agreement between railroad management and labor providing for employees who are displaced through coordination or other economy measures: Provided further, That whenever the Commission is of opinion, after hearing upon general application of carriers in any rate area or territory or group, or in the country as a whole, or upon its own initiative, after hearing, that increases in rates, fares, or charges should be permitted upon a percentage or other uniform basis because of the revenue needs of the affected carriers, considered collectively, it may provide for the pooling or division of the avalls of such increases, or any part thereof, among the affected carriers so as to enable, to the extent reasonably practicable, each of them to afford adequate transportation service, giving due consideration, among other things, to the efficiency with which the carriers concerned are operated, the amount of revenue required to pay their respective operating expenses, taxes, and a fair return on their railway property held for and used in the service of transportation servic

THE SPENDING PROGRAM AND THE NATIONAL DEBT

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Bridges] having advised the Chair that he desired to make some observations, the Chair recognizes the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, this is National Debt Week, and inasmuch as on the occasion of other national observances, such as Washington's Birthday, we have Washington's Farewell Address read to the Senate, and inasmuch as we should properly observe National Debt Week, I desire to quote from the speech of a great authority on spending and the national debt, with whom I know many Senators are in wholehearted sympathy. I cite as my authority for only a few moments Mr. Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, and I first quote from a speech delivered by him at Pittsburgh, Pa., on October 19, 1932, as follows:

It is fitting that I should choose Pittsburgh to sound a solemn note of warning addressed not only to the Republican leaders but also to the rank and file of American voters of all parties. There are some prices too high for the country to pay for the propaganda spread abroad in a Presidential election.

That is true when, as now, the Republican campaign management is guilty of spreading the gospel of fear.

That is true when in a desperate, futile, last-minute effort to dam the tide of popular disapproval that is steadily growing against the administration, they become alarmists and panic breeders.

This policy of seeking to win by fear of ruin is selfish in its motive, brutal in its method, and false in its premise. It is a policy that will be resented as such by men and women of all parties in every section of the land on November 8.

It is an insult to the intelligence of the voter to think that he or she can be fooled by shifting the boast of the full dinner pail made in 1928 to the threat of the continued empty dinner pail in

I assure the badly advised and fear-stricken leaders of the Re-publican Party that Democrats and those of the rank and file of their own party who are properly dissatisfied with their leadership are still American patriots and cherish in their hearts, as I do, the safety of the country, the welfare of its people, and the continuance

I am going to quote various sections rather than burdening the Senate with the whole speech:

This country is the richest and most resourceful Nation in the world. It can and will meet successfully every problem which it faces, but it can do so only through intelligent leadership, working unselfishly for the good of all people. That it has not had such leadership in its financial affairs will become obvious from the facts I shall relate to you tonight.

We all know that our own family credit depends in large part on the stability of the credit of the United States. And here, at least, is one field in which all business, big business and little business, and family business and the individual's business, is at the mercy of our big Government down in Washington.

Now, it is undoubtedly true that the mind of the average individual, man or woman, has been unable to keep pace in the past 10 or 12 years with the intricacles of Federal financing. In the first place, what used to be analogous to an old-fashioned account book that all the family could understand has become in Wash-ington a maze of intricate double-entry bookkeeping which only a few highly trained technical expert accountants could possibly understand.

What I should like to do is to reduce insofar as possible the problem of our national finances to the terms of a family budget. Now, the credit of the family depends chiefly on whether that family is living within its income. And this is so of the Nation. If the Nation is living within its income, its credit os good. If in some crisis it lives beyond its income for a year or two it can usually borrow temporarily on reasonable terms. But if, like a spendthrift, it throws discretion to the winds, is willing to make no sacrifice at all in spending, extends its taxing to the limit of the people's power to pay, and continues to pile up deficits, it is on the road to bankruintey.

For over 2 years our Federal Government has experienced unprecedented deficits in spite of increased taxes. We must not forget that there are three separate governmental spending and taxing agencies in the United States—National, State, and local. Because the apparent national income seemed to have spiraled upward from about thirty-five billions a year in 1913 to about ninety billions in 1928, all three of our governmental units became reckless, and the total spending in all three classes rose in the same period from about three billions to nearly thirteen billions, or from 8½ percent of income to 14½ percent of income.

But even then we did not greatly worry. We thought we were getting rich.

"Come easy, go easy," was the rule. It was all very merry while it lasted, but when the crash came we were shocked to find that while income dropped away like snow in the spring governmental expense did not, with the result that it is estimated that in 1932 our national income will not much exceed forty-five billions, while our total cost of Government will likely be considerably in excess of fifteen billions. This simply means that one-third, 33½ percent, of the entire income of our people must go for the luxury of being governed.

That is an impossible economic condition. Quite apart from every man's own tax assessment, that burden is a brake on any return to normal business activity.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may we have better order? I am unable to hear the distinguished Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There seems to be quite a convention, or something of the kind, going on in the Senate. There has been since the Senator from New Hampshire took the floor. It did not seem to disturb the Senator, so the Chair thought he would let it ride.

Mr. McNARY. I felt disturbed and somewhat annoyed because I could not hear the Senator's remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the Senator from Oregon is correct. The point of order is well taken. Will the Senate kindly be in order?

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I feel that perhaps the reason why better attention was not given is because I was quoting Mr. Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, in one of the greatest speeches, if not the greatest speech, he ever made. That was when he was against the idea of spending. I think it would be an execellent idea for some of his followers on the other side to listen to this speech because it really would give them inspiration to hear once more Governor Roosevelt talking when he was a candidate for the Presidency, not President of the United States, as he is today.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BRIDGES. I do.

Mr. CONNALLY. I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire, in connection with his appeal for hearers on this side, that I think it more appropriate that he get hearers on his own side, because, before he becomes President, he must be nominated by that side.

Mr. BRIDGES. Let me answer the Senator by saying that most of those on my side of the Chamber agree with the philosophy of Mr. Roosevelt in this speech that he made.

Mr. CONNALLY. Do they agree with the philosophy of the Senator from New Hampshire, though, that he should be the nominee of the Republican Party? [Laughter.]

Mr. BRIDGES. I am not discussing that question at the moment.

Taxes are paid in the sweat of every man who labors, because they are a burden on production and can be paid only by production. If excessive, they are reflected in idle factories, tax-sold farms, and hence in hordes of the hungry tramping the streets and seeking jobs in vain. Our workers may never see a tax bill, but they pay in deductions from wages, in increased cost of what they buy or (as now) in broad cessation of employment. There is not a transplayed man the transplayed is not an unemployed man, there is not a struggling farmer whose interest in this subject is not direct and vital.

Let me make it perfectly clear, however, that if men or women or children are starving in the United States, I regard it as a positive duty of Government to raise by taxes whatever sum may be necessary to keep them from starvation.

What I am talking about are the taxes which go to the ordinary costs of conducting government, and that is where the question of extravagance comes in. There can be no extravagance when starvation is in question; but extravagance does apply to the mounting Budget of the Federal Government in Washington during these past 4 years.

The most obvious effect of extravagant Government spending is then its hundar on form and industrial activity and is, then, its burden on farm and industrial activity and, for that, nearly every Government unit in the United States is to blame. nearly every Government unit in the United States is to mame. But when we come to consider prodigality and extravagance in the Federal Government—as distinguished from State or local government—we are talking about something even more dangerous. For upon the financial stability of the United States Government depends the stability of trade and employment, and of the entire banking, saving, and insurance system of the country.

To make things clear, to explain the exact nature of the present condition of the Federal nockethook. I must go back to 1929.

ent condition of the Federal pocketbook, I must go back to 1929.

Many people have believed the story which has been painstakingly circulated by this administration that the routine spending ingly circulated by this administration that the routine spending of our Federal Government has been kept on a fairly even keel during these past 5 years. It was perhaps easy to give this impression because the total outlay each year up to the emergency appropriations of this year did not increase alarmingly. But the joker in this is that total outlay includes interest and sinking fund on the public debt—a fixed charge which was declining during the days of national debt reduction and lower interest rates thereon. On the plain question of frugality of management, if we want to compare routine government outlay of 1927 with that for 1931, for example, we must subtract this so-called debt service charge from the total Budget for both years. If we do this, we find that the expenditure for the business of government in 1927 was $2,187,000,000 and in 1931, $3,168,000,000. That, my friends, represents an increase of actual administrative spending in those 4 years of approximately $1,000,000,000, or, roughly, 50 percent; and that, I may add, is the most reckless and extravagant pace I have been able to discover in the statistical record of any peacetime government anywhere, anytime. It is an ultimate fact which is the exact reverse of the thing announced as fact by Republican leaders.

Let me repeat those figures so that the whole country can get them clearly in mind. Leaving out debt service charges in both instances, the cost of carrying on the Government's business was $2,187,000,000 in 1927, $3,168,000,000 in 1931, an increase in 4 years of $1,000,000,000.

That is the story on the spending side of the Budget; but it is less than half of the whole appalling story.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield. Mr. MINTON. As I understand, it is the policy of the Republican Party this week to have what they call National Debt Week.

Mr. BRIDGES. I believe that is correct.

Mr. MINTON. Of course, that is for the purpose of directing the attention of the country to what the Republican Party considers to be one of the shortcomings of the present administration.

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes. Mr. MINTON. The administration overlooked a great bet when they did not have Starvation Week under Hoover.

Mr. BRIDGES. In answer to the Senator from Indiana I may say that I think this speech of the President before he became President, when he was Governor of New York, is one of the greatest of authorities. I wish the Senator from Indiana, who I know admires Mr. Roosevelt exceedingly, would read the speech. I am sure he would derive inspiration from it.

Mr. MINTON. I have read the speech, and, of course, the President of the United States, who was then Governor of New York, was a little misled at that time; he did not know what a mess he was getting into when he succeeded Hoover.

Mr. BRIDGES. I am glad that the Senator from Indiana for once admits that the President of the United States has ever been misled or been wrong in any way, shape, or manner. I believe that if the Senator from Indiana would read this speech, and remember it, and just once and a while put into practice the advice contained in the speech, he would be making a great public contribution.

Mr. MINTON. I think that if the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDEN-BERG] continue to quote the speech I will know it by heart in a short time.

Mr. BRIDGES. I cannot think of any greater contribution we can make to the Democratic leadership, and especially to the distinguished whip of the Democratic Party in the Senate, than to have him know this speech by heart. That would really be a public contribution.

I read further from the speech of the President:

On the income side of the Budget, the record is worse. Unlike other taxing agencies, the Federal Government does not levy a direct tax on property. Therefore, you don't have to be an expert to know that when anything happens that violently contracts sales and incomes and the prices of securities and commodities, there is sure to be a similar violent contraction of Federal income and that a Government charged with maintaining the financial stability of the United States under all conditions is under a very solemn duty, in such an event, to take immediate steps to avoid a deficit.

I do not know that I need to take the time of the Senate to read this entire speech of the President. I am giving the Senate the highlights from the speech, and I know it must be an inspiration-it is to me-to know that Mr. Roosevelt at one time was advocating a sound course, advocating a sound policy. I was with him then in his beliefs on these particular subjects, and I have not changed a particle. I am with him today in what he said as Governor Roosevelt. It has been the President, it has been the Senator from Indiana, it has been other gentlemen, who have changed. The Republican leadership in this country, in sponsoring a National Debt Week, I think are doing a great service. I think no more appropriate document could be incorporated in the RECORD during National Debt Week than this speech of Mr. Roosevelt, just as on Washington's Birthday we have Washington's Farewell Address, or just as on Lincoln's Birthday we might refer to his speech at Gettysburg. This speech of Mr. Roosevelt at Pittsburgh is a masterpiece, it is sound, and he was right. I wish that President Roosevelt today could return to the Governor Roosevelt of 1932 and advocate some of the same policies he then espoused. The country would be better off, and I am sure certain the Democratic leaders would be in a much sounder position.

Mr. President, in order not to burden the Senate with reading the entire speech, I ask that this speech of the President of the United States delivered when he was Governor of New York be printed in full as part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is fitting that I should choose Pittsburgh to sound a solemn note of warning addressed not only to the Republican leaders but also to the rank and file of American voters of all parties. There are some prices too high for the country to pay for the propaganda spread abroad in a Presidential election.

What is the normal and sensible thing to do when your neighbor gets excited and starts calling you and your friends bad names over the back fence?

Nothing is gained by calling him worse names or by losing one's temper. The peace of the community is best served by sitting down and quietly discussing the problems without raising one's voice. That is why I decline to answer vituperation by vituperation.

One of these problems—and a very vital one to my family and your family and the whole community—is the financial problem of making both ends meet.

I want to discuss this problem with you tonight fully. To do so I want to discuss this problem with you tonight fully. To do so sincerely, I must tell the facts as they are and conceal nothing from you. It is not a pretty picture, but, if we know it and face it, we have nothing to fear.

For upon the financial stability of the United States Government depends the stability of trade and employment, and of the entire banking, saving, and insurance system of the country.

To make things clear, to explain the exact nature of the present condition of the Federal pocketbook, I must go back to 1929.

Many people have believed the story which has been painstakingly circulated by this administration that the routine spending of our Federal Government has been kept on a fairly even keel during these past 5 years.

It was perhaps easy to give this impression, because the total outlay each year, up to the emergency appropriations of this year, did not increase alarmingly.

But the joker in this is that total outlay includes interest and sinking fund on the public debt—a fixed charge which was declining during the days of national debt reduction and lower interest rates

On the plain question of frugality of management, if we want to compare routine Government outlay of 1927 with that for 1931, for example, we must subtract this so-called debt-service charge from example, we must subtract this so-called debt-service charge from the total Budget for both years.

If we do this, we find that the expenditure for the business of government in 1927 was $2,187,000,000 and in 1931 $3,168,000,000.

That, my friends, represents an increase of actual administrative and the second services of the second services.

spending in those 4 years of approximately $1,000,000,000 or roughly 50 percent; and that, I may add, is the most reckless and extravagant pace I have been able to discover in the statistical record of any peacetime government anywhere any time.

It is an ultimate fact, which is the exact reverse of the thing announced as fact by Republican leaders.

Let me repeat those figures so that the whole country can get them clearly in mind. Leaving out debt-service charges in both instances, the cost of carrying on the Government's business was $2,187,000,000 in 1927, $3,168,000,000 in 1931—an increase in 4 years of $1,000,000,000.

That is the story on the spending side of the Budget; but it is less than half of the whole appalling story.

On the income side of the Budget the record is worse. Unlike other taxing agencies the Federal Government does not levy a direct tax on property. Therefore you don't have to be an expert to know tax on property. Therefore you don't have to be an expert to know that when anything happens that violently contracts sales and income and the prices of securities and commodities there is sure to be a similar contraction of Federal income, and that a government charged with maintaining the financial stability of the United States under all conditions is under a very solemn duty, in such an event, to take immediate steps to avoid a deficit.

Although 6 weeks had elapsed since the worst economic crash in history the Federal Budget of December 1020 did not even refer to it.

history the Federal Budget of December 1929 did not even refer to it. It estimated receipts for the year ending June 30, 1931, at four and two-tenths billions, actually more than they had been in the preceding year of economic fantasy—a figure which obviously could not possibly be attained without immediate return to the exaggerated speculations of 1929. The administration advised no economy.

On the contrary, it proposed a reduction of taxes and it blandly remarked, "Our finances are in sound condition. * * * Our estimated expenditures * * * are well within our expected receipts.'

Against those estimated receipts placed at four and two-tenths billions by Secretary Mellon, the sad fact is that actual revenue turned out to be three and three-tenths billions—$900,000,000 less than the estimate—a cool billion of overestimating.

than the estimate—a cool billion of overestimating.

I recite the 1929 Federal incident to clarify what happened at Washington in 1930 and 1931.

In December of 1930 a new Budget appeared. Vast declines in every form of business activity were now crystallized and certain. The national income was in a nose dive, and it was therefore certain that Federal income was on the verge of a catastrophe.

But that new Budget of December 1930 recommended neither increased taxes nor decreased expenditure, although upon that recommendation depended the credit standing of this country.

The Budget message of the President asserted that the deficit for 1931 would be only $180,000,000, and contained the statements:

"Nor do I look with great concern upon this moderate deficit."

"Nor do I look with great concern upon this moderate deficit," and "Our Government finances are in a sound condition."

A surplus of $30,000,000 was estimated for 1932—that is to say, the net deficit for the 2 years together was estimated at $150,000,000. Now at this time the President and the Secretary of the Treasury had plenty of experience with falling tax receipts.

The astonishing and inescapable fact is that no such results as those estimated could have been achieved without an immediate and complete business recovery from the practical paralysis then existing.

In other words, this 1930 Budget cannot fairly be called an estimate at all. It was an extreme hazard on the hope of an economic miracle—a gamble, if you please—on a highly improbable assumption, a gamble with your money and mine.

There is something much more than mere error in this kind of thing. Our people and the world are entitled to reasonable accuracy and a reasonable prudence, and above all they are entitled to complete frankness.

They have a right and a duty to place in retirement those who conceal realities and abuse confidence.

Remember these simple facts: On December 3, 1930, the admin-

Remember these simple facts: On December 3, 1930, the administration of President Hoover estimated that on the following June 30 the Government would have a total deficit of $180,000,000, but that during the following fiscal year—in other words, on June 30, 1932—it would have had a profit of $30,000,000, thus reducing the total deficit by June 30, 1932, to $150,000,000.

Now, my friends, I am going to give you a real shock. Instead of the estimated deficit of $150,000,000, the deficit on June 30, 1932, was three and three-quarters billion dollars.

No. I fear we cannot call this Budget an estimate—nor even a was three and three-quarters billion dollars.

No, I fear we cannot call this Budget an estimate—nor even a fair gamble. I don't know what to call this kind of representation of that kind of fact, but the name certainly is not candor.

Nineteen hundred and thirty-one proved to be the worst year yet experienced in the depression. For my distinguished opponent it was the year when all his distinctive 1928 economic heresies seemed to come home to roost together.

Let us call the roll of them:

(1) The loans to "backward and crippled countries," which he said would provide uninterrupted employment and industrial activity by expanding our export trade, no longer could be made.

(2) Retaliation against his monstrous Grundy tariff, against which the best economic and industrial thought in the country had stood in almost unanimous protest and against which it once stood in almost unanimous protest and against which it once more protested within the past week, and which was to cure our agriculture and maintain our industry, had begun to strangle world trade, including our own.

(3) Debtor nations (no longer sustained by our improvident loans

(3) Debtor nations (no longer sustained by our improvident loans and no longer able to export goods) were drained of gold for debts and, one by one, were forced to abandon specie payments.

(4) As a direct result of all these influences, our export markets dried up, our commodity prices slumped, and our domestic business was declining at a more rapid rate than business in some of the backward and crippled countries. Unemployment also began to rise here in even greater proportions than in Europe. To top this ruin of all these seductive 1928 theories (which were to bring the millennium of abolished poverty) came the complete collapse of the 1929 and 1930 administration fiscal policy.

The truth about the shattering effect of all these homing heresies

The truth about the shattering effect of all these homing heresies began to leak out as the summer of 1931 advanced. It is my opinion that in the conduct of national finances, as in the conduct of corporation finances or family budgets, if things are not going as well as one had hoped, it is far better to face the truth than to try to hide it.

That is why it was far more harmful to the Nation last autumn, and all through this year, to have the facts leak out than it would have been to have had them boldly and frankly disclosed to us when they were actually happening.

when they were actually happening.

My friends, the result of such a combination of disquieting revelations was inevitable. The very basis of confidence in our economic and financial structure, both here and abroad, was impaired. A fresh wave of liquidation ensued. Foreigners took gold back to their now shattered "backward and crippled countries"—until a cool billion had been drawn from our reserves. It was the Stygian climax to the black business year of 1931.

I emphasize this history because our opponents have now become almost frantic in their insistence that this entire sequence originated abroad—that no American policy was in the least to blame, and that to say otherwise is what they call "hideous misrepresentation." The "foreign cause" alibi is like ascribing measles

No; we need not look abroad for scapegoats. We had ventured into the economic stratosphere on the wings of Mr. Hoover's novel, radical, and unorthodox economic theories of 1928—the complete collapse of which brought the real crash in 1931. The Grundy tariff accentuated the drop.

As bard registy rushed up to meet our fall, this administration.

As hard reality rushed up to meet our fall, this administration did not see fit to adapt its fiscal policies to this inevitable con-

It is a responsibility which no campaign alibi can avert, and today the day of reckoning is here.

The recent administration strategy in this campaign is a direct appeal to public sympathy for their agony of spirit in the dark hours of 1931–32, when retribution for our chasing after strange economic gods overtook us. They protest against any assessment of just blame. But they protest in vain.

I want to say with all sincerity that I recite this record with reluctance. No man with a spark of humanity can fail to sympathize with our responsible leaders in hours of crisis.

Politics or no politics, I pay my tribute to the devotion of the President. It is not true to say that he has not been unremitting in his efforts, and I, for one, have never heard it said.

But I do indict his administration for wrong action, for delayed action, and for lack of frankness and courage.

Before the administration partisans complain of this arraignment they must remember that the American people are now about to exercise their democratic right of self-determination of their own fate and future. They must make a choice.

The administration's appeal for sympathy is not based on any frank acknowledgment of the failure of the policies so clearly portrayed by these tragic events.

It is, on the contrary, a denial that these principles have failed.

Indeed, it persists in the same course and even presumes to ask admiration for the stubborn ruggedness of that persistence.

In such circumstances I should fail utterly in my duty to the American people if I did not fearlessly portray these errors and link them directly to the havoc which they have brought and which

The autumn of 1931 witnessed, then, the complete wreckage of the administration program to that date—the collapse of its entire economic philosophy.

The convening of the Seventy-second Congress last December marked a new phase. The President appeared with his December 1931 Budget message.

That was a fateful moment. That was the time for an honest demonstration to the world that might have set the whole world trend of economic events in an upward direction, or at least checked the decline.

All that was necessary to do was finally to end the 2 years of vacillation and secretiveness; to tell the truth to the Congress of the United States; to rely on it to balance the Budget and establish American credit in the eyes of all the world.

This administration specifically acknowledged the necessity for that. It said it was going to balance the Budget. Then it said it was balancing the Budget, and finally it said it had balanced the Budget, and now, months later, it insists that because it has balanced the Budget it has saved the Gibraltar of world stability and prevented the overthrow of our form of government.

If all this is true, the administration has done well. If it is

If all this is true, the administration has done well. If it is not true, then the administration stands convicted of a new and fatal trifling with the welfare of our people and the credit of our country

Let us not waste words. I now quote from the daily Treasury statement at the end of the first quarter of the current fiscal year, made 3 weeks ago, on September 30, 1932:

"Excess of expenditures over receipts, $402,943,002."

For the corresponding quarter of last year the deficit was only $380,495,584, but at the end of the year it was $2,885,000,000. There is, therefore, strong indication that we are in for another staggering deficit. If the present rate continues, the true deficit as of June 30 next year will be over $1,600,000,000, not as large as it was in the unprecedented fiscal year of 1932 but so great that it was in the unprecedented fiscal year of 1932 but so great that it makes us catch our breath.

I regret to say that the appeal of this administration for applause for its soundness and courage last winter is simply not based on facts. The Budget is not balanced and the whole job must be done over again in the next session of Congress.

Who is to blame for this new blunder? I cannot answer that question better than to refer you to the dispassionate review of the last session of Congress made last Friday by my running mate, the Speaker of the House, John Garner.

No one who will take the trouble to read that speech will doubt that the patriotic determination of a willing Congress to balance this Budget at any cost was frustrated by the same kind of concealment and vaciliation that produced the staggering deficits of the years ending June 30, 1931 and 1932.

It is very clear that, under repeated insistence that the Budget

It is very clear that, under repeated insistence that the Budget was being balanced, Congress gave our Treasury—without hesitation or limit—every cent of revenue it asked for and that, at the end, the administration assured Congress and the country that the task had been accomplished.

task had been accomplished.

I have already shown how unreliable these constant assurances are. It is not seemly to conjecture motives, but I think it is fair to say the whole record of administration policy in the last 4 years reveals that it has been afraid to trust the people of the years reveals that it has been afraid to trust the United States with the true facts about their affairs.

That is a fundamental error which shows unfamiliarity with the true basis of American character.

While the President claims that he did finally recommend new taxes, I fear that this courage came 2 years too late and in far too scanty measure.

It explains "prosperity around the corner." It explains two complete concealments of deficits and the insufficiency of the action taken last winter.

It is an error of weakness and an error which I assure you I shall not make.

our Federal extravagance and improvidence bears a double evil; first, our people and our business cannot carry its excessive burdens of taxation; second, our credit structure is impaired by the unorthodox Federal financing made necessary by the unprecedented magnitude of these deficits.

The latter is the more technical, but, to my mind the more immediately dangerous evil and, at the risk of being tedious to many of my audience, I want to ask their indulgence while I talk, for a moment, straight to our financiers.

Instead of financing the billion-dollar deficit of 1931 in the regular way, our Government simply absorbed that much of the lending capacity of banks, and by so much impaired the credit available for business.

In that year the amount of Government obligations held by our banks increased by a little more than $1,000,000,000.

You know as well as I do that this administration's claims that it has provided credit for industry and agriculture by pouring credit into banks are not frank.

Commercial credit has continuously contracted and is contracting now. Most of this new Government-created credit has been ing now. Most of this new Government-created credit has been taken to finance the Government's continuing deficits.

The truth is that our banks are financing these stupendous deficits and that the burden is absorbing their resources.

All this is highly undesirable and wholly unnecessary. It arises from one cause only, and that is the unbalanced Budget and the continued failure of this administration to take effective steps to balance it. If that Budget had been fully and honestly balanced in 1930, as it could have been, some of the 1931 collapse would have been avoided. Even if it had been balanced in 1931, as it could have been, much of the extreme dip in 1932 would have been obviated. Our financial men know the unnecessary muddle that has accumulated and is still accumulating in Washington. Washington.

Now, how can we continue to countenance such a condition? Now, now can we continue to countenance such a condition? In all conscience, can an administration which has so frequently failed in a matter so directly touching your own responsibilities ask for your support and trifle with your common sense by these campaign alibis about mysterious foreign forces and this specious talk about sound fiscal policies and administration?

Would it not be infinitely better to clear this whole subject of obscurity—to present the facts squarely to the Congress and the people of the United States and secure the one sound foundation of permanent economic recovery—a complete and honest belance.

of permanent economic recovery—a complete and honest balance of the Federal Budget?

In all earnestness I leave the answer to your common sense and judgment.

The other bad effect of this fiscal mismanagement is not at all technical. It is the burden of high cost on the backs of all our people.

I can state the condition best by quoting one paragraph from a document published a week ago and signed by both Alfred E. Smith and Calvin Coolidge:

"All the costs of local, State, and National Government must be reduced without fear and without favor. Unless the people, through unified action, arise and take charge of their Government they will find that their Government has taken charge of them. Independence and liberty will be gone and the general public will find track for a condition of constituted to a condition of constituted to a condition of constituted to a condition. find itself in a condition of servitude to an aggregation of organ-ized and selfish minorities."

Every word of that warning is true, and the first and most important and necessitous step in balancing our Federal Budget is to reduce expense.

The air is now full of Republican death-bed repentance on the subject of economy, but we must look deeper than these eleventh-hour pronouncements. You cannot go very far with any real Federal economy without a complete change of concept of what are the proper functions and limits of the Federal Government itself.

Perhaps we can get some glimpse of the President's underlying idea about the Federal Government from his 1928 speeches. He proposed, you remember, "a new thing in Government." He says he "reorganized the Department of Commerce on a greater scale than has ever been attempted or achieved by any government in the world."

In his book, the New Day, he says, "A nation which is spending ninety billions a year can well afford a few hundred millions for a workable program."

I could go on quoting for a good many minutes, but perhaps the point could be made clearer by recalling that the Department of Commerce went through even the heavy war strain on about thirteen millions a year.

When Mr. Hoover left it, it was spending thirty-nine millions, and for 1933 it estimated it will spend forty-three millions. It is now housed in what is facetiously called in Washington the "temple of fact finding," which cost the people considerably more than the Capitol of the United States.

That record may explain the 50-percent increase in Government overhead in 4 years, 1927-31, and I am sure that the whole group of quotations reveal why you can never expect any important economy from this administration. It is committed to the idea that we ought to center control of everything in Washington as rapidly as possible.

That was the idea that increased Government cost by a billion in 4 years.

Now, ever since the days of Thomas Jefferson that has been the exact reverse of the democratic concept-which is to permit Washington to take from the States nothing more than is necessary to keep abreast of the march of our changing economic situation.

In the latter philosophy and not in the philosophy of Mr. Hoover (which I think is responsible for so much of our trouble), I shall approach the problem of carrying out the plain precept of our party, which is to reduce the cost of the current Federal Government operations by 25 percent.

Of course, that means a complete realinement of the unprecedented bureaucracy that has assembled in Washington in the past 4 years.

I am no stranger to Washington. I knew it at first hand during the administrations of Theodore Roosevelt and William H. Taft. I served in Washington for seven and a half years during the Wilson administration.

I have some familiarity with the psychology of the administra-tion of the National Government. More than that, I have con-ducted for 4 years the administrative and executive affairs and the policies of a State that has 13,000,000 inhabitants.

Now, I am going to disclose to you a definite personal conclusion which I adopted the day after I was nominated in Chicago. Here which I adopted the day after I was hollinated in Chicago. Here it is: Before any man enters my cabinet he must give me a twofold pledge of (1) absolute loyalty to the Democratic platform, and especially to its economy plank; (2) complete cooperation with me looking to economy and reorganization in his department.

I regard reduction in Federal spending as one of the most impor-tant issues of this campaign. In my opinion, it is the most direct and effective contribution that government can make to business.

In accordance with this fundamental policy, it is equally necessary to eliminate from Federal budget-making during this emergency all new items except such as relate to direct relief of unemployment.

As a part of this phase of the problem I note that former President Coolidge is reported as having said in a speech in New York City:
"An early and timely word from the Democratic candidate for President that he would reject the proposal to increase the national debt by $2,300,000,000 to pay a bonus would have been a great encouragement to business, reduced unemployment, and guaranteed the integrity of the national credit. While he remained silent, economic recovery was measurably impeded."
That charge is baseless and absurd, for the reason that last April my views on the subject were widely published and have been subsequently frequently quoted. I said:
"I do not see how, as a matter of practical business sense, a gov-

"I do not see how, as a matter of practical business sense, a government running behind $2,000,000,000 annually can consider the anticipation of bonus payment until it has a balanced Budget, not only on paper but with a surplus of cash in the Treasury."

No one, for political purposes or otherwise, has the right in the absence of explicit statement from me to assume that my views have changed. They have not.

have changed. They have not.
So much for another effort by Republican leaders to preach an unwarranted gospel of fear and panic to the American electorate.
I have sought to make two things clear: First, that we can make savings by reorganization of existing departments, by eliminating functions, by abolishing many of the innumerable boards and commissions which over a long period of years have grown up as excrescences on the regular system. These savings can properly as excrescences on the regular system. These savings can properly be made to total many hundreds of millions of dollars a year.

Secondly, I hope that it will not be necessary to increase the present scale of taxes, and I call definite attention to the fact that, as soon as the Democratic platform pledge is enacted into legislation modifying the Volstead Act, a source of new revenue amounting to several hundred millions of dollars a year will be made available toward the balancing of the Budget.

I refer specifically to a Federal tax on beer, which would be raised through the sale of beer in those States, and those States only, which, by State law, allow the sale of beer.

At the same time I reiterate the simple language of the Democratic platform which opposes the return of the saloon, as follows:

cratic platform which opposes the return of the saloon, as follows:
"We urge the enactment of such measures by the several States as will actually promote temperance, effectively prevent the return of the saloon and bring the liquor traffic into the open under complete supervision and control by the State."

The above two categorical statements are aimed at a definite balancing of the Budget.

At the same time, if starvation and dire need on the part of any of our citizens make necessary the appropriation of additional funds which would keep the Budget out of balance, I shall not hesitate to tell the American people the full truth and recommend to them the expenditure of this additional amount.

My friends, these have been unhealthy years for prophets, and I hasten to disclaim that role.

But one thing I know. A powerful cause contributing to economic disaster has been this inexcusable fiscal administration and the obscurity and uncertainty that has attended and grown out

There it remains for all to see-a veritable cancer in the body politic and economic.

Is it prophecy to assure you that if we remove this destructive growth we shall move on to better things?

To my mind this is so plain and persuasive as scarcely to be open to argument. As I said in the beginning, this is the one open to argument. As I said in the beginning, this is the one field in which business is wholly in the grip of government.

By the same token, it is the one field where government can make the greatest possible present contribution to recovery. To this contribution I here pledge the utmost of my faith and my

I am as certain as mortal man can be certain of anything in the future that from the moment that we set our hands openly and frankly and courageously to this problem, we shall have reached the end of our long, hard, downward road and shall have started on the upward trail.

We shall have built for economic recovery a firm footing, on a path broad, true, and straight.

Join me, and "Let's go!"

REGULATION OF MODES OF TRANSPORTATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2009) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by extending its application to additional types of carriers and transportation and modifying certain provisions thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, when the session ended yesterday an amendment I had offered was ordered to be printed. It has been printed and distributed, and on behalf of the committee I offer the amendment to the bill. I ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 206, after line 12, it is proposed to insert a new paragraph reading as follows:

(6) All orders, determinations, rules, regulations, permits, con-tracts, or agreements which have been issued or authorized by the United States Shipping Board or the Department of Commerce or the United States Maritime Commission under any provision of law repealed or amended by this act or in the exercise of duties, powers, or functions transferred to the Commission by this act and which are in effect at the time this act takes effect shall continue in effect until modified, terminated, superseded, or repealed by the Commission or by operation of law. Any proceeding, hearing, or investigation commenced or pending before the United States Maritime Commission at the time this act takes effect shall be continued by the Commission in the same manner as though originally commenced before the Commission if such proceeding, hearing, or investigation (1) involves the administration of duties, powers, and functions transferred to the Commission by this act, or (2) involves the exercise of jurisdiction similar to that granted to the Commission under the provisions of this act. All records, reports, tariff schedules, contracts, or agreements transferred to the Commission under this act shall be available for use by the Commission to the same extent and to the same effect as if such records were originally records of the Commission.

All schedules filed with the United States Maritime Commission prior to the effective date of this act under the provisions of the Intercoastal Shipping Act of 1933 and the Shipping Act of 1916, as amended, relating to water transportation subject to this act, shall continue in effect until modified, terminated, superseded, or repealed by the Commission or as otherwise provided in this act.

On page 206, line 13, strike out "(6)" and insert "(7)."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the Chair state the parliamentary situation. The Vice President this morning stated that the amendment on page 49, which had been passed over, was the pending amendment. By unanimous consent, the pending amendment is temporarily passed over so that the amendment of the Senator from Kansas may be

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senate desires to have an explanation of the amendment in addition to what was said yesterday, I shall be very happy to make one.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I think I had something to do with holding the amendment up yesterday, so that it might be printed, and I should like to hear an explanation from the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. REED. The only purpose of the amendment is to continue in effect the rules, regulations, and orders of the Maritime Commission, including any rates prescribed by the Maritime Commission, until such time as jurisdiction can be transferred from the Maritime Committee to the Interstate Commerce Commission, in the event the pending bill shall be enacted into law.

Mr. McCARRAN. At that point let me ask a question of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. Under the amendment, would the precedents and decisions now applying to the Maritime Commission be applicable to the Interstate Commerce Commission and be construed by and become a part of its consideration?

Mr. REED. I cannot answer that question.

Mr. WHEELER. I think I can answer it. When the transfer is made from one commission to the other it is provided that the rules and regulations which are in effect at the present time shall remain in effect until they are subsequently changed, if ever, by the Interstate Commerce Commission. This amendment was requested as necessary in administering the proposed act.

Mr. McCARRAN. I take it that it is an administrative matter.

Mr. WHEELER. Purely.

Mr. McCARRAN. The two commissions being entirely separate, and the viewpoint behind the several decisions and rulings which have been made during the years being entirely different, I am wondering how the Interstate Commerce Commission is to apply the rules.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think there will be any change in the viewpoint, so far as the rate-making policy is concerned; and all we are seeking to do is to transfer the rules and regulations from the jurisdiction of one commission to that of the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas on behalf of the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the committee has about six or eight clarifying amendments, and I desire to offer them at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They may be presented in order. The clerk will state the first amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas on behalf of the committee.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 9, line 1, after "(7)", it is proposed to insert "(a)", and after line 11, on the same page, it is proposed to insert a new paragraph, as follows:

(b) Nothing in this act shall apply to the transportation of passengers or property by water on the high seas between ports of the continental United States and Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and Alaska, or be deemed to interfere with the jurisdiction of the United States Maritime Commission over such transportation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 19, in line 5, it is proposed to delete "Puerto Rico"; and in line 6, after "United States", it is proposed to insert "other than Hawaii and Puerto Rico."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is an amendment to the committee amendment which was agreed to yesterday. Without objection, the vote by which the committee amendment, on page 19, line 4, was agreed to, is reconsidered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Reed] to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 14, paragraph (10), in line 15, after the word "common", it is proposed to insert "or contract"; and in line 20, after the words "contract carrier", to insert "and such services are to be deemed to be those of the carrier for whom they are performed."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 15, in line 8, after the word "means", it is proposed to strike out the words "of any mode of transportation subject to the provisions of this act" and to insert in lieu thereof "of railroad and other modes of transportation."

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from Kansas will give us an explanation of that amendment.

Mr. REED. It has principally to do with the definition of an express company. In the bill as printed an express company is defined as a company which handles business by any mode of transportation. The committee suggests that that be changed so as to provide that an express company is a company which handles transportation "of railroad and other modes of transportation." It is only a clarifying amendment to bring the provision into line with the present interpretation of the law.

Mr. McCARRAN. I take it the Senator will bear with some of us who have not had the experience and opportunity to study the bill as it was considered in the hearings. It struck me that the amendment, as I heard it read, it not having been printed and not being available to us, might make some change other than the change which the Senator has now explained

Mr. REED. I assure the Senator from Nevada that is not the case and he need have no fear of it.

Mr. WHEELER. There is another provision which is controversial, but this one is not.

Mr. McCARRAN. I thank the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator who is the sponsor of the particular amendment as to its effect. I have had at no time any disposition to oppose the amendment, and it is only for the record that I ask the question. We are now proposing to define an express company and we are saying that an express company is a common carrier under certain circumstances. Is that not so?

Mr. REED. I may say to the Senator from Vermont that the express companies have long been common carriers, and we are only trying to make the definition in the bill correspond with the definition which has been accepted for many years. There is some controversy with regard to the use of the words "express company" and "trucking company" in connection with another matter, to which the pending amendment, however, has no relation.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, it is not that aspect of the definition with which I am somewhat concerned. It is an entirely different aspect of the matter. The Committee on the Judiciary has already had to consider a bill relating to contributory negligence and the assumption of risk, in the consideration of which the contention has been made, and I think thoroughly demonstrated, that an express company is not a common carrier, and that it is not a carrier at all. I do not want to have this definition adopted without recording myself as believing that the definition should be considered in relation to the context and limited to the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, for the benefit of the distinguished Senator from Vermont and the distinguished Senator from Nevada, I wish to say that, as printed, the bill in this particular reads as follows:

The term "express company" includes any common carrier engaged in the express business by means of any mode of transportation subject to the provisions of this act.

That language is found on page 15 of the bill, beginning in line 6 and ending in line 9. All the amendment proposes to do is to strike out "of any mode of transportation," and so forth, and to substitute "of railroad and other modes of transportation."

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I am entirely satisfied with the Senator's interpretation of his amendment and with that understanding I shall vote for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas on page 15, in lines 8 and 9.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 49, line 23, after the word "carriers", it is proposed to insert "by railroad."

Mr. REED. I may suggest, Mr. President, that that is merely an addition to an amendment which will be taken up later. We wanted to have it in proper shape for consideration. It deals with the pooling question, and we are talking now only about pooling railroad revenues. The bill as printed does not contain the words "by railroad."

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, a point of order. I am wondering if this is an amendment to the committee amendment. As I heard it read, I gathered that it must be an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. REED. It is a simple matter, and I assure the Senator it is not subject to any question. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment to the amendment be agreed to.

Mr. McCARRAN. But the entire committee amendment is a controversial matter which must necessarily come before the Senate.

Mr. REED. If the Senator from Nevada desires, I am perfectly willing that the amendment to the amendment lie over.

Mr. McCARRAN. It should lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment to the committee amendment will be passed over.

The clerk will state the next amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 64, line 7, after the word "act", it is proposed to insert "and from lessor companies owning railroads, vessels, motor vehicles, or pipe lines used in interstate commerce covered by this act."

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of that amendment?

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say that that amendment was suggested by the Bureau of Statistics of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is merely a clarifying amendment. It deals simply with an administrative matter.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to have the clerk state the amendment again.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 64, line 7, after the word "act", it is proposed to insert "and from lessor companies owning railroads, vessels, motor vehicles, or pipe lines used in interstate commerce covered by this act."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas,

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment on page 117, line 6, after the word "water", it is proposed to insert "covering traffic in the transportation in which such carrier is."

Mr. McCARRAN. The amendment is proposed to be made to a committee amendment which has already been agreed to. The vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to will have to be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the vote by which the committee amendment beginning on page 115, line 4, was agreed to will be reconsidered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment on page 118, line 15, after the word "water", it is proposed to insert "covering traffic in the transportation of which such carrier is"; and on the same page, line 16, it is proposed to strike out the period and to insert a colon and the following proviso: "Provided further, That the rule as to the burden of proof specified in paragraph (1) of this section shall apply to this paragraph."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment is offered to a committee amendment which has heretofore been agreed to.

Without objection, the vote by which the committee amendment, beginning in line 8, on page 117, and extending through line 16, on page 118, was agreed to is reconsidered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to. The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

REPORT OF RESCUES FROM SUBMARINE "SQUALUS"

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. I am sure the Members of the Senate will be pleased to know that good news has been received from the sunken submarine Squalus. In order to give assurance, the commanding officer at Portsmouth Navy Yard himself announced over the radio that the diving-bell experiment had been successful, and that seven men had been brought to the surface in the first dive. The maximum number that can be brought to the surface at one time is eight. The reports are that all are well. Four compartments are completely flooded. We do not know how many may be caught in those compartments. However, the men have plenty of food, and, aside from the fact that it is cold and they have no lights, they are comfortable.

REGULATION OF MODES OF TRANSPORTATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2009) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by extending its application to additional types of carriers and transportation and modifying certain provisions thereof, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Reed] on behalf of the committee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. Under the heading "Penalties", on page 182, line 16, after the word "thereof", it is proposed to insert "or of any lessor corporation owning facilities used by carriers."

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I wonder if we may have an explanation of the amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. This amendment is complementary to the one requested by Dr. Lorenz, in order that the Commission may be able to ask the lessor companies to furnish annual reports. It is an administrative matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Are there any further committee amendments?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent to take up the committee amendments passed over, on pages 112 and 113, under the heading "Through Routes and Joint Rates; Divisions."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. On page 15, I call the attention of the Senator from Montana to paragraph numbered (14), beginning in line 10, which reads as follows:

The term "private carrier of property by motor vehicle" means any person not included in the terms "common carrier by motor vehicle" or "contract carrier by motor vehicle," who transports in interstate or foreign commerce by motor vehicle property of which such person is the owner, lessee, or bailee, when such transportation is for the purpose of sale, lease, rent, or bailment, or in furtherance of any commercial enterprise.

Mr. WHEELER. I will say to the Senator that that is the present law.

Mr. McKELLAR. As the Senator knows, I live in a corner of Tennessee, at Memphis. Arkansas is just across the bridge, and Mississippi is just outside the city limits. Is the language which I have read the present law?

Mr. WHEELER. The language referred to is the present law. It has not been changed in the slightest degree.

Mr. McKELLAR. I see no objection to it down to the word "bailment."

Mr. McKELLAR. To use the illustration I gave a while ago, if a private concern in Memphis, Tenn., desires to deliver its goods to the South, in Mississippi, or to the West, in Arkansas, it may do so without coming within the provisions of Mr. WHEELER. Exactly. The most attempted to be done-and that has not been done-is to try to regulate the safety conditions. There is a provision in the old law, which remains the same, with respect to safety provisions.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

1939

Mr. McNARY. What is the request made by the Senator from Montana with regard to the amendment which was passed over yesterday and which is now to be considered?

Mr. WHEELER. The amendment is on page 112, beginning in line 7.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I call the Senator's attention to the language on page 111, in line 4.

Mr. WHEELER. The clause is-

With any common carrier by water subject to this act.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The words "by water" have been stricken out

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Can the Senator tell me why that was done?

Mr. WHEELER. Because of the fact that the water carriers asked that it be done.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. What water carriers asked that it be

Mr. WHEELER. The language reads:

Such minimum charge, or such rule, regulation, or practice, so prescribed by the Commission, shall give no advantage or preference to any such carrier in competition with any common carrier.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. "By water."

Mr. WHEELER. "By water." The words "by water" were stricken out so as to make the provision applicable to all carriers.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Previous to that, with the consent of the chairman, we had amended the bill on page 27, line 17, in an item which was called to the Senator's attention by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris] by striking out "in and of themselves."

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The effect of the amendment on page 111 would be to nullify that action.

Mr. WHEELER. No; quite the contrary.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Oh, no.

Mr. WHEELER. I have to disagree with the Senator.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. What water carriers asked for that amendment?

Mr. WHEELER. I thought they did.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator thought they did?

Mr. WHEELER. I will say to the Senator that my understanding was that they did. The experts say that no one asked that the words "by water" be deleted; but the experts recommended that this be done, and I moved that those words be stricken out because I felt it was proper to do so. It is proper; and if the Senator will read the amendment he will find that it makes good sense.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have read the amendment.
Mr. WHEELER. The amendment does not affect the water carriers in the slightest degree.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may the clerk state the amendment? I am in doubt as to just what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be

Mr. WHEELER. Does the Senator refer to the amendment which was agreed to last night?

Mr. McNARY. No; the one we are now discussing.

Such minimum charge, or such rule, regulation, or practice, so prescribed by the Commission, shall give no advantage or preference to any such carrier in competition with any common carrier.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. "By water."

Mr. WHEELER. "By water subject to this act." We struck out the words "by water" so that there would be no preference to any carrier, whatever the form of transportation in which he is engaged.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield. Mr. McNARY. The change is simply to strike out the words "by water"?

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the words "by water" were wholly superfluous. They were put in through a clerical error. They never had any business in the bill, and should not have been included in the first place. We are only correcting the error of putting them in, and making the rule regarding discrimination affect common carriers of all kinds, without any distinction as between water, highway, or

I assure the Senator from Minnesota that the two words stricken out yesterday, "by water," in line 4 on page 11, never should have been in the bill.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. In my opinion, the rule of rate making for water in relation to railways and trucks is thereby restored. I do not think it should be.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent to take up the committee amendments on pages 112

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered, and the first amendment on page 112 will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 112, after line 6, it is proposed to insert:

If any tariff or schedule canceling any existing through route cr joint rate, fare, charge, or classification without the consent of all carriers parties thereto or authorization by the Commission is suspended by the Commission for investigation, the burden of proof shall be upon the carrier or carriers proposing such cancelation to show that it is consistent with the public interest.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Montana. The amendment which is now pending and the amendment immediately following it, striking out the language beginning in line 14, on page 112, and extending through the word "in" at the top of page 113, relate to the same subject, do they not?

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. BROWN. I understood that we agreed yesterday that we would pass over that amendment until the amendment in which the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Byrd] was interested, with which this amendment is connected, could be considered.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator is mistaken. The amendment under consideration relates to an entirely different subject. It relates to through routes and has nothing to do with the pooling provisions. The provisions with reference to pooling are the present law, which is not changed at all.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to say a few words or make a few inquiries about the amendment on page 112. I understand that to the amendment there is considerable opposition, and that it met with considerable opposition in the committee. Is not that a fact? I understand that the amendment was opposed by practically all the so-called class I railroads in the country.

Mr. WHEELER. I would not say that it met with the disapproval of all the class I railroads. My understanding is that there is a division in the American Association of Railroads. Some of the carriers are favorable, or at least are not opposing it, but one or two railroads are opposed to it. On the other hand, all the short-line railroads of the country are in favor of this particular provision.

I wish to explain to the Senate exactly what the amendment does, if I correctly understand it.

First of all, the amendment has been before the Interstate Commerce Committee on two previous occasions, and I am informed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Truman] that it was adopted by the Senate on two previous occasions. So it is not a new matter. On one occasion hearings were held before the Committee on Interstate Commerce. Then the amendment was suggested by the Interstate Commerce Commission and by short-line railroads all over the country.

Mr. BROWN. The bill did not pass the House and become a law.

Mr. WHEELER. No; it never became a law. It was introduced, as a matter of fact, to correct an interpretation put upon the present law by the Supreme Court of the United States. I think nearly everyone felt that the Court had put a wrong interpretation on it.

What is does is to permit the Interstate Commerce Commission to establish a through route. We will say that a railroad shipper in Seattle wants to ship some goods north to a point in Canada, north of North Dakota. If the law remains as it is, the shipper's goods are carried from Seattle to St. Paul and then back to North Dakota and then finally to Canada. This provision would simply give the shipper the right to say whether he wanted his goods to go by that way or whether he preferred to have them go by the shorter distance.

Mr. BROWN. I do not understand that it gives the shipper that opportunity.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, yes.

Mr. BROWN. I understand that the Interstate Commerce Commission can direct how that shipment shall go.

Mr. WHEELER. No.

Mr. BROWN. What the Senator says is not borne out by the language which is stricken out in the amendment on page 112, beginning in line 14. It says there, in substance, that a shipment may not go upon the originating road or the road which picks it up at a junction point if the route that shipment would then take would be unduly roundabout or circuitous. The language is this:

Unless such inclusion of lines would make the through route unreasonably long as compared with another practicable through route which could otherwise be established.

Therefore what the Senator suggests could not be done.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield for a question?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. The question of reasonableness, to my mind, does not rest with the consignor.

Mr. BROWN. No; it rests with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is the way I construe it.

Mr. BROWN. That is the way I understand it to be.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator I am sure he is wrong about it. It leaves the option of routing with the shipper, but under the authority now given the Interstate Commerce Commission it cannot establish a route over the shorter way.

Mr. BROWN. I do not think the Senator is right about that.

Mr. WHEELER. Well, let me finish my answer. According to this provision the shipper can select whether he wants to ship over the shorter route or over the longer route. Let me call attention to what the Interstate Commerce Commission itself has said in its annual report:

In another part of this report the recent decision of the Supreme Court in United States v. Missouri Pacific (278 U. S. 269) is summarized. Briefly, it was decided in connection with the establishment of through-routes section 15 (4) prohibits us from requiring any carrier by railroad to join in an all-rail through route which does not embrace its long haul unless the inclusion of its long haul would render the route unreasonably long.

Mr. BROWN. That is the point I make.

Mr. WHEELER. The Interstate Commerce Commission is given no power to say to a shipper, "You have got to ship by this route." What the Interstate Commerce Commission does is to establish a route, and it gives the shipper the option as to the way he wants to ship his goods.

Mr. BROWN. Is it not a fact that now between practically all points in the United States there are literally hundreds, if not thousands, of diverse routes that may be taken?

Mr. WHEELER. That is true, of course.

Mr. BROWN. As I gather the purpose of the language on page 112, the pending amendment, the addition of the language in lines 7 to 13, and striking out the rest of the page, is designed for the purpose of taking a shipment from a road which has it if the Interstate Commerce Commission decides that it should be taken from it and routed on some other short-line railroad.

Let me give the Senator an example. If the Long Island Railroad or the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad has a shipment from Boston to Washington, and it goes to the Pennsylvania Railroad in the city of New York, the Pennsylvania Railroad, under the present law, once having that shipment, can carry it all the way to Washington, because it has a direct route. The Interstate Commerce Commission cannot take that shipment away from the Pennsylvania as the law now stands.

Mr. WHEELER. Unless-

Mr. BROWN. It has a direct route, and it would not come under the exception as stated by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Under this new proposal if the Interstate Commerce Commission desires to do so in order to help some short-line road, it could route that shipment from Philadelphia, perhaps, over to Pittsburgh, and from Pittsburgh down to Washington over the B. & O. It does not seem to me that would be economical transportation.

Mr. WHEELER. The Interstate Commerce Commission under the pending amendment could not, nor has it ever been able to route a shipment over any line. It can but compel the publication of routes available to the shipper. The pending amendment would permit the Commission to cause the publication of a route which might utilize any available lines. But there is no reason to assume that the Commission would require the establishment of any such absurd route.

Mr. BROWN. I do not think the Senator is right about that.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me refer to the interpretation which has been put upon it by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BROWN. That is just what the Supreme Court said the Commission could not do in the Subjaco case.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me read the Commission's statement:

Our interpretation of the paragraph had therefore been that it was intended to protect the long hauls only of originating carriers, or of subsequent carriers after obtaining possession of the traffic. The main reason for this interpretation, which has now proved to be erroneous, was that it was necessary to give reasonable effect to the statute, for there are innumerable instances of overlapping lines where the conflicting long-haul interests of participating carriers would, in default of such an interpretation, prevent us from establishing any through route. The meaning and effect of the Supreme Court discussion was discussed at length in Stickell & Sons v. Western Maryland Railroad Co. (153 I. C. C. 759).

Because of this situation, which is likely to result in substantial nullification in many instances of a statutory provision of great importance to shippers, and sometimes to carriers as well, we recommend that paragraph (4) of section 15 be amended so as to restrict the long-haul right to originating carriers.

There is no question at all that the shippers of this country have gone on record to a very large extent as being in favor of this provision so that they will have an opportunity to take advantage of a shorter route, and will not have to go around Robin Hood's barn to ship their goods. That is all the provision means. It seems to me that if we are passing legislation in the interest of the shipper—and that is what we are seeking to do—and not in the interest of two or three great railroads, we ought to put this provision in the bill.

I know that the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. and some of the other large railroads are opposed to this provision, but regardless of whether or not they are opposed to it, they are evidencing, in my judgment, a very selfish attitude and are taking an untenable position and one to which, to a large extent, the shippers, particularly the smaller shippers, are unalterably opposed.

Mr. BROWN. I will say to the Senator that the hearings disclose that 95 percent of the class I railroad mileage of the United States is opposed to this amendment and only 5 percent in favor of it. The Denver & Rio Grande Railroad is the only class I railroad, I understand, of any size that is in favor of it, and that is because of the peculiar competitive conditions that have arisen out of the shipments through the Ogden gateway.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that the American Association of Railroads in their conventions have taken no position with reference to this particular provision.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from Montana knows as well as I do that that is because they have an agreement among themselves that if any railroad objects the American Association of Railroads will not take a position upon any such matter as this.

Mr. WHEELER. What are we legislating for? Are we legislating for merely a few of the large railroads that are prosperous, or are we legislating in the interest of the general public and the shippers? If we are legislating in the interest of the shippers, and want to protect short-line railroads as well as long roads, then it seems to me this is a legitimate amendment and should be adopted.

I have no short-line railroads in my State, so far as I am aware, that are interested in this bill, but I know that other Senators on the floor, particularly the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Austin] favor this provision. The Senator from Vermont fought for this amendment. As I have said, at the instance of the Interstate Commerce Commission, backed by the shippers of the country, I introduced a bill, the committee held hearings on it as an independent bill, and it passed this body on two different occasions by an overwhelming vote. As a matter of fact, there was no opposition to it. I feel that the amendment ought to be adopted. That is all I have to say about it.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator—and I hope he will not take his seat yet—that I do not think it is a proper principle to take business away from a man because he happens to be able to meet his pay rolls and his other expenses. The Senator must admit that the purpose of this amendment is to take away business from the railroads that are making a few dollars and to turn it over to short-line roads that are not able to stand upon their own feet. I wish to say further to the Senator that he knows that this amendment does not help a shipper one iota. It does not lower a single freight rate to any shipper who ships goods over these lines.

Mr. WHEELER. Suppose I am a shipper in Seattle, and I want to ship some goods to a certain point, and I am anxious to have those goods shipped to that point in a hurry; if I put the goods on the Milwaukee road, say, they can take that shipment and ship it to Chicago, and then ship it back over their road, and take it up to Canada.

Mr. BROWN. That cannot be done.

Mr. WHEELER. But I am telling the Senator that that is what is done. He says it cannot be done, but I say it is being done.

Mr. BROWN. Then the Interstate Commerce Commission is not enforcing the law.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, yes, they are. They have tried to enforce the law.

Mr. BROWN. The law says the railroads cannot do that. Mr. WHEELER. The Senator says it cannot be done, but I am saying that it is done; and the Interstate Commerce Commission, who ought to know, tell me they cannot do anything about it unless the law is amended.

As I say, so far as I am concerned, I have not any particular interest in this piece of legislation, except that as a perfunctory duty, as chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee, I introduced the bill because the Commission had repeatedly suggested that legislation of this kind ought to be passed in the interest of efficiency of transportation and in the interest of the shippers. There are other Senators who perhaps know more about the matter than I do; and I should like to have the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Austin] or some of the other Senators who are interested in the subject discuss it.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President-

Mr. BROWN. I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AUSTIN. I do not want to take the Senator from Michigan off the floor, but I do want the floor when I enter upon a discussion of this subject.

Mr. BROWN. Then I shall be very glad to yield the floor to the Senator.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I think we ought to clear the decks and get down to close fighting. From the questions which have been asked it is obvious that there is not a clear understanding of the purpose of the amendment.

In the first place, the assumption which, as I understand, is made that this amendment is in any way coercive upon a shipper of goods is wholly erroneous. If this amendment of the committee is accepted, a shipper of goods will have an option to ship over the long route or the short route just as he may prefer.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield in order that I may have a better understanding of the matter to which he is addressing himself?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. We have been talking about a great many things. To which specific amendment is the Senator now addressing himself?

Mr. AUSTIN. I should be glad to answer that question. It is the amendment on page 112, lines 14 to 25, inclusive, which proposes to strike out a certain paragraph. As we consider it, I think I ought to state that this paragraph constitutes section 15 (4) of the Interstate Commerce Act, and that section is a limitation upon the power of the Commission to exercise its good judgment. That section is a prohibition. It says to the Commission, "Even though you find that the shorter route is for the public benefit, you cannot short haul the long, big trunk line. You must give it the route and the rate."

I have said that the economic effect of that is to take the business by force away from the little short-line railroads that contribute to the economic stability and support of small communities all over the continent. It takes away from the shipper anywhere along one of those short lines the privilege of shipping his goods on the rate established over the short line, and it may coerce him to take his goods in a truck and take them away from the short line and start them on the line that the Commission has established as a through route and rate.

This paragraph, as found in the present law, reads as follows:

In establishing any such through route the Commission shall not (except as provided in section 3, and except where one of the carriers is a water line) require any carrier by railroad, without its consent, to embrace in such route substantially less than the entire length of its railroad and of any intermediate railroad operated in conjunction and under a common management or control therewith, which lies between the termini of such proposed through route, unless such inclusion of lines would make the through route unreasonably long as compared with another practicable through route which could otherwise be established.

I hold up a piece of paper, rectangular in shape, for illustration. Let us assume that the starting point of the shipment is in one of those corners, and that there is a railroad or transportation company that owns connecting lines that go clear around the piece of paper. If there happens to be a shipper living anywhere between these lines, and if he is fortunate enough to be on a line which constitutes a hypotenuse of the triangle created by two sides, at right angles to each other, of this sheet of paper, he and all other shippers in that area ought to have the benefit of the reduction of the cost of transportation that naturally and economically flows from transporting over the shortest route between two points. Can he get it? No. Why? Because the Interstate Commerce Commission has been told by the Congress of the United States, "You shall not short-haul that long route."

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. I do not understand the illustration at all. I do not see why that cannot be done. On what line is the hypotenuse? Who owns the hypotenuse railroad? Why cannot shippers on that line ship in either direction anywhere they want to ship?

Mr. AUSTIN. Suppose the shipper lives in a town down at the corner, where there is a junction between the long railroad and the short one, and he wants to ship across this sheet of paper instead of around, can he do it? No.

Mr. TAFT. Why can he not do it? Why would not going around make the through route unreasonably long as compared to the straight line?

Mr. AUSTIN. Of course, if the shipper can establish with the Interstate Commerce Commission that exception in the present act, he can perhaps get the long-line short haul, as they call it, by including in the route for the rate this short line of railroad, but-

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Just a minute. I want to make this statement, so that the Senator from Michigan may include this idea in what he is going to ask:

I made the claim that the assumption was erroneous that the shipper was coerced by this amendment. I now also make the statement that the other premise on which the Senator from Michigan based his inquiry of the Senator from Montana is erroneous, and that is that the purpose of this amendment and the effect of this amendment, if agreed to, are to take away from these long lines the freight rates and the freight business.

Mr. President, that premise is wrong. I am standing here making an earnest fight for this amendment for a wholly different reason, and that is that without this amendment many short-line railroads will discontinue the service they now give to the communities they serve, because through section 15 (4), which we now seek to strike out, the Congress of the United States has protected a type of monopoly which has given to the long line and the long route an advantage by law over the short route.

I am not merely theorizing. I know from experience what I am talking about. I live in a community which today has one of these railroads in receivership, and its life is precarious. All of the area in the Champlain Valley, between Lake Champlain and the ridge of the Green Mountains on the west side of the State of Vermont, wherein there is considerable heavy traffic, will be seriously injured if that railroad is obliged to live under the prohibition which compels the Interstate Commerce Commission to forbid the short hauling by railroads in that area of freight that originates, say, for example, in Hartford, Conn., or other points in New England, and that is designed to go west.

Now the freight must be shipped by a longer route, whereas the route should be shortened. The economic effect ought to be to save expense to the public, and service to the State of Vermont, by keeping alive this short-line railroad, would be of paramount value. Is it admitted-I admit it-that this would take away from a long-route railroad some of its traffic and turn it over to the short-line road. Yes, it would do that; but of what consequence is that compared to the effect of this amendment being assented to and the life of the short-line railroad in that area being saved to serve the community? I am speaking in behalf of people who have to ride on trains-and I am one of them-and for people who have to ship their goods on trains.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, how far would the Senator have the longer lines subsidize the short lines which cannot live by themselves? How far would the Senator go?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I charge that that is an unfair question. There is not a cent of subsidy asked for. No other railroad will give to the Rutland Railroad, now in distress, one cent. This amendment, if adopted, will give to the Rutland Railroad its natural right, its economic right, to come to the Commission and satisfy the Commission that, in the public interest, it should be included in a route to the West, so that shippers may have an option to choose either the long route or the short route.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Vermont what is wrong with the present law? It merely provides that when a railroad has a shipment which it can handle entirely by carrying the shipment from the point of origin to the point of destination, such railroad is entitled to carry the shipment over its entire route between those termini, unless such route would make the haul unreasonably long as compared with another practicable through route which could be established. It seems to me that that is reasonable and fair. It does everything the Senator wants done. That railroad should carry the commodity from its point of origin to its destination unless the route is unreasonably roundabout and long. I do not see what is wrong with the present law.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I do not see anything morally right or economically right in that claim.

Mr. BROWN. If that limitation were not included; but it is included.

Mr. AUSTIN. As I see it, the business of the Congress is not limited to promoting the interests of great trunk-line railroads only. As is well known, I am not one of those who desire to break any corporation or any railroad, and I am glad to help the trunk-line railroads when it can fairly and justly and reasonably be done. But here we have a case where the trunk-line railroads have prevented the passage of a similar measure, either in the form of an amendment or a bill, which was in the first place originally proposed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and then for 11 consecutive years recommended. On that recommendation bills have been offered, and some of them have passed the Senate: but the great railroads have had sufficient influence and power to prevent the consummation of the legislation.

What is the effect? Does it merely give the public a choice as to what it will do? Oh, no. The public, as represented by the Interstate Commerce Commission, has not any choice. The Supreme Court, in the case of United States v. The Missouri Pacific Railroad Company (78 U. S. 269), called the Subiaco case, at page 276 said this:

The act does not give the Commission authority to establish all the through routes it may deem necessary or desirable in the public interest-

There is no option there.

The general language of paragraph 3 is limited by paragraph 4. The latter lays down the rule that, subject to specified exceptions, a carrier may not be compelled to participate in a through route which does not include substantially its entire line lying between the termini of the route.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. In just a moment. This is the Supreme Court speaking:

The purpose is to protect the long-haul routes of carriers.

Here is the point as applied to the illustration: The Interstate Commerce Commission, which represents the public, cannot say to a long-haul carrier, "You must regard this route, which includes shorter transportation, a part of the route if the shipper chooses to ship his goods that way." The heavy hand of Congress rests on the public when it says to the Commission, "You shall not be permitted to include in that route the short line."

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield now? Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. I think the Subiaco case is a fine example of how uneconomic the situation could be. In that case the Missouri Pacific had a line 311 miles long, from Fort Smith to Memphis. The Interstate Commerce Commission, in order to give to the other road involved, the Fort Smith, Subiaco & Rock Island, a 45-mile haul, which would lessen the total haul from 311 to 308 miles—in other words, to save 3 miles of the total haul of the railroad—forced the Missouri Pacific to give up freight at a junction point, have it transferred to another railroad, pick it up at another junction point, and put it back on the Missouri Pacific to enable this short line to make the 45-mile haul. It seemed to me that not only was the Supreme Court entirely right as a matter of law, but that it was entirely right as a matter of common sense. On a full car there would have been a transfer switching charge of about $10 at each junction point along that line, which, while it would make no difference in the rate, because the rate would be the same either way, nevertheless would cost the roads more money, and thereby the general freight-paying public would be further burdened.

There is an example of what the Congress, by repeated inaction on the bill to which the Senator referred, has refused to let the Interstate Commerce Commission do. It seems to me it was right and proper that they should prevent the type of uneconomical transportation exemplified in that case.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I venture to say that the Congress may have been misled by the same kind of fallacy to which we have just listened. Is there anything right at all in the claim just made by the Senator from Michigan when we consider the public interest? Is there anything right about it? Should not the public have the choice whether they will take a line 45 miles shorter than another

Mr. BROWN. It was only 3 miles shorter.

Mr. AUSTIN. Well, 3 miles, or 3 feet; I do not care how much shorter it may be. What I am fighting for is a chance for the public to have an option, and I would not take away from the long line of railroad any of its rights in doing so. This proposal would not prevent the long-line railroad getting its route. That would not be the effect of the amendment. There would be left, just as there should be, the option and the right of both the railroads to do business, and the option and the right of the shipper to use either one he chooses. There would not be the monopoly that is created by the prohibition we are now trying to wipe out.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I first desire to call attention to the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission for years assumed they had this very power. What the Senator from Vermont is talking about is this, as I understand it. Section 27, found on page 111, would seem to give the Commission the power-and they thought they had the power-but section 2, which we are striking out, took away that power, or at least the Supreme Court of the United States said that it took it away. The Commission had always been exercising the power and there was not any serious complaint about it. When we had a hearing before the committee, the National Traffic League, representing the shippers of the country, appeared before the committee in favor of the bill. Representatives of other farm organizations and other shippers throughout the country also appeared before the committee in favor of the proposal.

When the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce in the Seventy-fourth Congress held hearings, there appeared before the committee representatives of the State utility commissions of Minnesota, Missouri, Idaho, Wisconsin, Utah, Iowa, Louisiana, Ohio, Washington, North and South Dakota, and the District of Columbia. They all urged that the pending proposal be enacted into law. So, as a matter of fact, the State commissions all over the country have gone on record in favor of the proposed legislation, and all we are doing is what the Senator from Vermont said we are I think candidly the class I railroads would have no complaint if the measure were enacted into law.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, in addition to what I have already said on this particular point, I wish to refer to a report made by the Senator from Montana from the Committee on Interstate Commerce in the Seventy-fifth Congress. This is Report No. 404 to accompany S. 1261. I read a sentence from the second page of it, as follows:

It is not the intention of the committee to interfere with the right of the trunk lines to their long haul, except where this right conflicts with the shipper's right to the shortest route and lowest If there is this conflict, the shipper is merely given the opportunity, if he wishes, of using the shorter or cheaper route.

That is all there is to this matter. We can take our choice. We can support the interests of communities here and there all over the United States which now have, to support the superstructure of their business, short-line railroads. If we do not give the short-line railroads some of the benefits which are intended to be given to transportation companies by the pending measure, if it becomes law, we will take away that superstructure

I wish to call the Senate's attention to the testimony of a gentleman who represented the short-line railroads. By the way, there are 308 such railroads in this country. They are entitled as railroads to some consideration, but I do not stand on that plea. That is not the strong or pressing reason for having the amendment agreed to.

The strong reason is the need to do something for the business generally of the United States and for the shippers of the United States, for not only do we confront the possibility of these small lines which are now doing business on a shoestring, as it were, going out of business entirely, but we confront the repercussions from that happening by way of injury to factories, merchants, farmers, and others who have goods to transport to market.

I wish to call the Senate's attention to the testimony of Mr. J. M. Hood, president of the American Short Line Railroad Association, in bringing the application of the pending amendment right down to a definite case. I had asked him:

If the change were made, it would not be arbitrary in its nature, would it? It would merely give additional jurisdiction and power to the Commission to make an order adapted to the circumstances; right?

Mr. Hoon. That is entirely correct, Senator. It merely gives to the umpire jurisdiction of something which we believe to be justly in the public interest. The Commission must have a record, must make findings, and any order adverse to a carrier by which the carrier might have been ordered to put in a route that it thinks it ought not to put in would be reviewable in the courts. There is nothing arbitrary about it.

Senator Austin. Under the present law—that is, under paragraph 4, section 15—the Commission has not the power to compel a company to come in and join in rates to the west, we will say, from the east to the west, because it happens to own a certain percentage of another short line, we will say, to increase its mileage. I wish you would explain this proposed change fully for I am very much you would explain this proposed change fully for 1 am very much interested in it.

Senator Minton. Let me ask you one question: The legislation we passed did not make it compulsory for the shippers to take the route that might be established by the Interstate Commerce Commission, but it made it optional to the shippers; that he might use that route which the Interstate Commerce Commission had established; is that right?

Mr. Hoop. That is correct, Senator. The result of the bill would simply be that when the Interstate Commerce Commission finds an additional route to be in the public interest such a route will be published, as we say, it will be open to the shipper, and the shipper may, at his option, route his traffic via that group of lines. It will not result in the diversion of a single car of freight from one carrier to another unless the shipper himself prefers to use that route.

I am sure Senators will pardon me for referring to that portion of the testimony, even though it may indicate a selfish interest on my part, that is interest for my State of Vermont. Mr. Hood said at page 545 of the hearings:

Mr. Hoop. I should like briefly to point out to you that while the tal mileage of the short-line railroads is not large as compared with the whole mileage and the number of communities served by the short-line railroads exclusively is not large in proportion to the total communities in the United States, yet they are important to each of those communities, and there are thousands of them. Many of them are county seats; one of them is a State capital—in Nevada—and throughout the Nation there are important producing and consuming areas served only by short-line railroads. In the aggregate they originate or terminate a very large portion of the

I am going to skip a paragraph and come down to this:

These short-line railroads are just as important to their communities as is the biggest line entering Washington to Washington. In fact, they are more so. Washington has five railroads, technically, and it could get along without one of them fairly well, but these thousands of communities depending upon a short-line railroad for their traffic to move in and out cannot get along at all without the chest line railroad. They would simply disenpent without if They would simply disenpent without it. short-line railroad. They would simply disappear without it. Their industry would cease. Their products could no longer reach the markets, or their establishments could no longer receive the raw materials required.

I think the State of Vermont has had a fairly recent and alive example of that in the serious condition in which the Rutiand Railroad finds itself, and the State has done many unusual things in order to preserve the service of that railroad. I do not think the State cared a continental about the people whose money was in the railroads, and I do not think it should. If an investor made a mistake by putting his money somewhere that it had developed it is unproductive, that is his business, and he is not entitled to any particular public sympathy.

I do not think that the State of Vermont is particularly concerned about preserving the railroad business, but they are very particular about preserving the State of Vermont and the livelihood of its citi-And, after all, even with the excellent service being rendered by many of the competing forms of transportation with railroads, there still are many human activities which can best and more economically be furthered through railroads, and there is no indication that that situation is going to change in any way in the immediate

With that I am going to ask you to give your usual intelligent, considered, patient attention to the provisions of S. 2009, and bring out a bill which will preserve all of our transportation, which will give all forms an equal opportunity to compete for the available

Mr. President, there we have it. That is the question before us right now. Are we in favor of extending assistance to all the railroads, including the small lines, or is it our business to look after what may be claimed to be a vested right of the trunk lines? It is not a vested right. It is not a constitutional right. What they have enjoyed up to date by virtue of their monopoly they are welcome to, and if it did them any good I am glad. But one of the problems confronting us today, when we look the whole field over-and we have tried to deal with it in the pending modification of the Transportation Act—is to find here and there in various strategic and necessary spots of the United States little railroads, 308 of them, which we must help as well.

As a Congress we do not take away anything from the trunk-line roads. We tender to the public a natural right, and that is the right to choose the route over which it will ship its goods and the companies which shall participate in the carriage of those goods. That is a natural and an economic right. I see no reason for opposing the amendment. I think the Congress for years has made a mistake in not striking the shackles from the regulatory powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission so as to enable the Commission to provide for the public interest, the public welfare of all

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Lucas in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 112.

Mr. AUSTIN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 112, lines 7 to 13, inclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next committee amendment passed over will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next committee amendment passed over is, on page 112, line 14, after the word "In", to strike out "establishing any such through route the Commission shall not (except as provided in section 10, paragraph (12) of this act and except where one of the carriers is a water line) require any carrier by railroad, without its consent, to embrace in such route substantially less than the entire length of its railroad and of any intermediate railroad operated in conjunction and under a common management or control therewith, which lies between the termini of such proposed through route, unless such inclusion of lines would make the through route unreasonably long as compared with another practicable through route which could otherwise be established: Provided, That in."

to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, the next committee amendment passed over is on page 49, beginning in line 2 with the words "Provided further." I ask that that portion of the committee amendment down to and including the word "measures", in line 21, be rejected. After it was first adopted by the committee, the committee decided it should not have been adopted, and I ask that it be rejected.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, is that the amendment with reference to pooling?

Mr. WHEELER. No. It has reference to freight shipments in less than carload lots. The Interstate Commerce Commission made a study of the subject. It has been suggested to the railroads that there are some abuses which ought to be corrected by the railroads themselves. There are many abuses in reference to this matter, and there is no doubt in my mind that some of the railroads are violating the present law.

However, this matter was not discussed in the full committee and no hearings were had upon it. I felt, as did the majority of the committee, that on a subject so controversial and important as this the committee ought to have more information before it came to the Senate and asked for the adoption of this particular provision.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BYRD. Would not the same objection the Senator has just advanced apply to the remainder of the pooling provisions? As the Senator knows, there were no hearings upon that matter. Why should he separate the provisions, strike out a part of the pooling provisions, and leave another part in?

Mr. WHEELER. I will say to the Senator that I am only doing what the committee directed me to do. The other matter will be taken up and discussed immediately after this portion of the committee amendment is disposed of. The committee was in favor of the pooling provisions, but suggested that this particular provision be stricken out.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why should not this subject, which seems to me to be intimately tied up with the question of pooling, be passed over by unanimous consent until after the general subject of pooling has been discussed in connection with the next amendment?

Mr. WHEELER. The subject under consideration is entirely different.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It seems to be intimately connected with pooling.

Mr. WHEELER. It is not intimately connected with pooling. One provision relates to the matter of the railroads taking over functions now performed by freight-forwarding companies, and the other relates to pooling of earnings by the railroads. They are two entirely separate and distinct subjects.

Mr. BYRD. Is not the effect practically the same? The amendment provides that an agency created and owned by the carriers shall be subject to the provisions of the Act with relation to common carriers.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not care to enter into a discussion of that subject at this time. I am only carrying out the wishes of the committee.

Mr. BYRD. The matter in question is related to the whole subject.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, if the Chairman of the committee does not desire to enter into a discussion of the subject-

Mr. WHEELER. At the present time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the chairman of the committee does not desire to enter into a discussion of the subject at the present time, as he says, and he is asking us to reject part of the committee amendment, it seems to me the committee amendment should be passed over until such time as he is willing to discuss the matter.

Mr. WHEELER. I am willing to discuss this particular amendment. I said I did not want to enter into a discussion of the next committee amendment at this time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the Senator make an explanation of the pending committee amendment?

Mr. WHEELER. I shall be glad to do so. I did not understand the question.

The particular language under discussion is as follows:

Provided jurther, That upon complaint or upon its own initiative, after full hearing, if the Commission finds that it will be in the interest of better service to the public or economy in operation, the Commission shall by order require common carriers by railroad subject to this act to handle their less-than-carload freight, including traffic now handled by express companies or freight forwarding companies which assume common carrier liability, through an agency or agencies created and owned by all such carriers or groups of carriers, subject to such rules, regulations, and divisions groups of carriers, subject to such rules, regulations, and divisions groups of carriers, subject to such futes, regulations, and divisions of earnings among the participating carriers as may be agreed upon by such carriers, or in default of agreement as the Commission may find to be just and reasonable. Such agencies are hereby made common carriers subject to the provisions of this act. Any employee of such carrier or carriers displaced by such change of operation shall be subject to the so-called Washington agreement between railroad management and labor providing for employees who are displaced through coordination of other economy measures.

In other words, this amendment would have the Commission direct the railroads to organize a company for the purpose of handling less-than-carload-lot freight. Quite frankly, let me say that I do not believe the Commission have any authority to do that from a legal standpoint. There are Members of the Senate committee who disagree with me, but I do not feel that we ought to go so far as to say to the railroads or to have the Commission say to the railroads, "You have got to set up a corporation to do this particular class of business." I am asking that this amendment be disagreed to. Does that answer the Senator?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Montana that it does not answer my question, because it seems to me that the smaller communities of this country that are not able to ship in carload lots should be protected. For instance, the town in Missouri in which I was born and reared, a little town of 1,800, under the present system is being discriminated against because it is not able to ship in carload lots on very many occasions. Why should it be discriminated against and yet great cities such as St. Louis, where I now live, and Kansas City, and the other metropolises of my State have the advantage?

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator, I do not disagree with him in principle; I say that it is a subject that ought to be regulated; that something ought to be done about it; but what I am saying to the Senator is that this bill provides that the Commission may by order direct various railroads to set up a corporation amongst themselves and to own that corporation and then divide the earnings amongst them. It is a complicated matter, and I do not think that, from a constitutional standpoint, the Commission has any right to act as proposed, and I do not think Congress has any power to make them do so.

Some Senators disagree with me, but I am expressing my view about it. The subject is of such importance that when we discussed it in the committee we felt that something further ought to be done about it, but not at this particular time. We are going to introduce some bills or resolutions and have the matter investigated and try to correct the evils and abuses that have crept in.

The Senator from Missouri refers to a little community in his State. Let me say that what is happening at the present time is not that simply one small community is being discriminated against but that some of the shippers in such small communities, little shippers, are being discriminated

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will say to the Senator from Montana that the only concern I have is about the little shippers in the little communities.

Mr. WHEELER. Some of them are being discriminated against at the present time, and something has got to be done, in my judgment, to correct the situation, but this amendment goes entirely too far, and, in my judgment, could not be upheld by the court.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the Senator explain why it goes too far and wherein it goes too far?

Mr. WHEELER. I thought I had done that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will say to the Senator from Montana that I have the very greatest respect for his opinion, as I have great personal affection for the Senator himself, but the only explanation the Senator has made is that the full committee has directed him to oppose the amendment. I am not familiar with the technicalities of the matter, except I do have some knowledge of general principles, and I would be glad to know why this amendment is wrong.

Mr. WHEELER. I thought I had made it plain; perhaps I have not, and probably that is my fault; but I will try to state it again. I said that this amendment, if adopted, will direct the Interstate Commerce Commission to say to the railroads, "You must set up a corporation, an independent corporation"; and the various railroads would get together and set up a corporation for the purpose of handling lessthan-carload lots of freight, and that after they should do that, then they would pool the earnings and divide them up amongst the railroads in some way. I do not believe that the Congress has any right to enact a law to say to the railroads, "You have got to set up a corporation to take business away from somebody else." That is what this amendment would do.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am not certain, but I myself think so.

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield. Mr. TRUMAN. There are large freight-forwarding companies that are owned by eastern railroads. For instance, the New York Central Railroad, the Van Sweringen railroads, and the Pennsylvania Railroad have large freight-forwarding companies which handle less-than-carload freight. They do discriminate against the little shippers; they discriminate against communities; but if this amendment were agreed to. it would, by law, put them out of business by creating another corporation to take over the business. They ought to be regulated, but we have not arrived at a conclusion as yet as to how they ought to be regulated.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If forwarding companies ought to be regulated, why are they not regulated by this bill? This is a bill that reaches out and relieves the Maritime Commission of all jurisdiction with regard to water transportation; it brings in everything except the air-line companies which have sufficient publicity at this time in the guise of national defense to keep them out; it brings in every kind of transportation; but it leaves out of its control forwarding companies owned by the railroads. If we are going to have forwarding companies, I submit to the Senate that they ought to be regulated by law.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator tell us how much the forwarding companies made last year?

Mr. WHEELER. We have some figures on that point which show that they made a tremendous amount of money last year.

When this matter came before the committee there were no hearings had with reference to forwarding companies. The Interstate Commerce Commission has held hearings, and they have denounced the practices of the forwarding companies; every member of the Commission feels that the forwarding companies ought to be regulated. The matter came before the subcommittee but was not taken up in the full committee. It came up late before the subcommittee, after we had held hearings for nearly 2 months. The Commission has been divided as to how it should be handled. It has made recommendations.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. Reed] is much more familiar with the subject than am I. He felt that this amendment ought to go in the bill, but, as a matter of fact, some of us felt that the amendment went too far, and did not provide the proper way of handling the subject. We agreed that the Senator from Kansas and I should get together and introduce a measure or hold hearings to determine just exactly what should be done in this particular regard. That is what we intend to do, and I should like, with the permission of the Senate, to have the Senator from Kansas make his explanation and statement with reference to it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to take a moment to correct an impression or two which the Senator from Missouri may have created or at least to remove myself from discredit in the eyes of the distinguished Senator from Missouri about the exclusion of air regulation from this bill. It was not because of publicity so far as I was concerned, and I am the member of the committee who made the motion to strike out all reference to regulation of air transportation from the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to say to my friend from Kansas, what he already knows, that I had no intention whatever of reflecting, in any degree, on him or upon the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate. I say, however, that if the theory of the bill is logical in any degree whatever, it should include all forms of transportation within the regulatory authority, and that there is no rhyme or reason whatever in excluding air transportation which is now an active competitor of all other forms of transportation, and from year to year will be a much greater competitor in the matter of transportation. I say, if the theory of the bill is correct, then all forms of transportation should be included.

Mr. REED. Do I understand that the distinguished Senator from Missouri is going to offer an amendment from the floor to reinclude air transportation?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am not; I am going to vote against the bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I now wish to speak about freight-forwarding companies, and I will be as brief as I can. It is an important subject; the Congress for a number of years has legislated against discrimination; but discrimination has crept back into the handling of freight, among other means, through the device of freight-forwarding companies. The freight-forwarding companies, taken as a whole, do precisely what the Senator from Missouri intimated they do, that is, discriminate against small communities. Let me give an example, and then I want to cite some facts.

If a shipper went to the New York Central Railroad Co. and offered a shipment of less than a carload of freight, he would pay the full tariff rate. He could telephone the Universal Freight Forwarding Co., which is owned by the New York Central, and that company would come and get his goods, assemble them along with the goods of others who had less than carload lots, and he would be given a lower rate, the freight moving over the New York Central Railroad. If that is not unlawful discrimination, then I have no conception of what unlawful discrimination may be.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator vield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not a fact that practically all of the forwarding companies are 100 percent owned by the railroads which constitute the carrying lines?

Mr. REED. I am going to touch upon that question, if the Senator pleases.

There are about 20 freight-forwarding companies in the country. Three of them do most of the business. Two of the three largest ones are owned by railroad companies. The Universal is owned by the New York Central. If my memory serves me right, the National is owned by the Erie, the Pere Marquette, and the Chesapeake & Ohio jointly. They do just what the Senator from Missouri says they do. In addition to discriminating between shippers, they discriminate between communities.

Manifestly, the freight-forwarding method of handling less-than-carload stuff by assembling it into carloads can apply only to large communities. A receiver of goods in St. Louis, the present home town of the Senator from Missouri, may enjoy a rate less than the published rate upon the railroads from New York to St. Louis; but his old home town of Bowling Green could not possibly have that advantage and would have to pay the full rate.

I am responsible for this amendment being in the bill, and I want to refresh the chairman's memory as to its history. He and I have worked so hard, we have seen so many people. we have spent so many weary days over this matter that sometimes things are not as clear as they might be. In the original discussion of the multitude of things that went into this bill, the freight-forwarding question was one that was considered. One day in the committee there were four or five matters that required expert attention, and the committee telephoned over to the Interstate Commerce Commission and asked that it might be permitted to send me over as an errand boy to discuss with the Commission these things, among which was the freight-forwarding question. I went over and spent an afternoon in conferring with a number of the Commissioners, selected by themselves. We did not try to get the whole 11 together; but the Commission itself selected 4 or 5, I have forgotten which, including Mr. Commissioner Eastman, Chairman Caskie, and Mr. Commissioner Mahaffie, as I remember. We discussed the freightforwarding question among other things, but they were not able to agree as to just what we could do about it.

The Commission has made an extensive investigation. I hold in my hand a report in Docket 27365 of the Interstate Commerce Commission, entitled "Freight-Forwarding Investigation," decided October 11, 1938. I reported back to the committee what the situation was. The question came up again. The motor carriers, through their national association, had been invited to submit criticisms of the bill. I may say parenthetically that I have a deep affection for the chairman of the committee. He is a very fine chap to work with. It has been an education to me to work with him. I am very happy to have been associated with him; but we about came to the conclusion that we could not make anybody happy. Anyway, the American Trucking Association submitted a memorandum showing its objections to the bill. I hold in my hand a copy of that memorandum. Their first point was that we did not include the freight-forwarding companies in the definition of common carriers.

I thoroughly agree with the chairman, if I correctly understood him, that it would be unwise at this time to make the freight-forwarding companies common carriers. I think the freight-forwarding companies are a parasite upon the railroad transportation of the country. If it is possible to write legislation which will remove these discriminations, put the freight-forwarding companies out of business, and put back into the cash drawer of the railroads the revenues and profits which the freight-forwarding companies have, I am for that course.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I have been wondering, all the time since this question has been under discussion, whether under existing law the practices of the forwarding companies are not illegal. Why do they not constitute discrimination? It seems to me, from all that has been said, that the Senator from Kansas is right when he says they are parasites and ought to be put out of business. Why not put them out of business by calling them parasites in the law?

Mr. REED. Will the Senator and the Senate have patience with me for perhaps 10 minutes more? I want to cover, if I can, as briefly and tersely as possible, the various phases; and I am going to come to the specific point to which the distinguished Senator from Nebraska has referred.

The trucking companies went further in comment:

This means that a forwarding company operating motor vehicles would be a common carrier by motor vehicle under the provisions of section 3 (9), and, at the same time, it could engage in unregulated common-carrier operations as an indirect carrier or forwarding company without being subject to rate control.

* * Certainly, such a situation would completely nullify regulation of motor carriers, because they cannot compete with an unregulated agency which has no responsibility to render service—can cut rates and choose traffic. This is a very dangerous situation, because the large forwarding companies are owned by the railroads, are unregulated, and are used as a means of cutting rates.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I cannot put words in the Senator's mouth, but the principal object of my interruption a moment ago was to submit the question whether this practice is not illegal under existing law, even without passing this bill.

Mr. REED. May I proceed?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. The Commission, in the synopsis of its report, made this finding as section 30 of the syllabus, as it would be called in a court opinion:

Certain eastern respondents, through their respective control or domination of particular forwarding companies, were found to be charging different compensation to some shippers than to others for substantially like services, and to be rendering the public a service by indirection without appropriate tariff authority, in violation of sections 2 and 6 of this act.

That is the synopsis of the finding by the Commission. The Commission, in a number of instances, found that the forwarding companies were being used to circumvent and escape regulation provided under the law. One may ship goods by the forwarding companies for, say, 3 cents a hundred pounds less on first-class traffic than the same railroad would charge if he took his less-than-carload traffic to the railroad direct. There is a varying schedule of charges which are different from the published tariff charges of the railroad. I think it was the Senator from Wisconsin who asked the question.

In 1936 the three largest freight-forwarding companies in the country had a gross revenue of $102,000,000. They paid the railroads for transportation of their goods, after they had assembled them into carload lots, $58,500,000. I wish to be fair. How much expense the forwarding companies had to incur for collection and denvery and for warehousing I do not know; but I do know, or at least it is generally assumed, that the freight forwarders have made very hand-some profits. It is my very firm conviction that this whole practice is illegal, and that it discriminates between shippers, and discriminates between cities and towns which are sufficiently large to have that character of service, and small places which are not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not wish to interrupt the trend of the Senator's thought, because he stated a moment ago that he desired to make a brief statement, but my mind is running along the same channel as the mind of the Senator from Nebraska on this question. If this is an illegal practice, as the Senator from Kansas has just stated, if it is discriminatory, if it allows railroad corporations, through subsidiaries owned by the railroads in the guise of "forwarding companies," to discriminate between individuals and municipalities and regions, is not the remedy to prohibit it by law, if it is not already prohibited—as I agree with the Senator from Nebraska it is already prohibited—rather than to legalize a practice which the Senator from Kansas himself admits is already illegal?

Mr. REED. I beg the Senator from Missouri not to misunderstand. I am not proposing to legalize what they are doing.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. By permitting the railroads to form forwarding companies, and to indulge in such practices, even though subject to regulation, are we not legalizing a practice which I think we all agree is illegal at the present time?

Mr. REED. Let me give the history of the amendment, which will take but a moment.

There was so much criticism of the forwarding companies that I was delegated by the committee to see whether or not we could not do something about it. Again I went to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and this time the conflicting opinions in the Commission were brought together. The amendment, as it is written into the bill, appearing on page 49, was not written by me, although I was the avenue of transmission to the committee; it was written in the Interstate Commerce Commission, and admittedly both the chairman of the committee and I were fearful that it was not all that it should be.

The chairman of the committee and I discussed this matter. The amendment was printed in the bill, and I have agreed with the chairman that we should consider it. I think I am correctly stating the agreement with the chairman, because I feel very deeply upon this subject. I am going to do my best, I assure the Senator from Missouri, to correct this and any other discrimination and unlawful practice which I can detect and help to legislate out of existence.

I agree with the chairman; this is not all we would wish. I do not want to reflect upon the gentleman who wrote the amendment. As the report shows, there is a fairly substantial difference of view within the Interstate Commerce Commission. Of the 11 Commissioners, I think 6 or 7 made this report; 2 or 3 more concurred almost entirely; 1 or 2 dissented in part. It is a situation which I think should be handled by the Congress of the United States. I should be very happy to cooperate with the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce and the committee to see if we cannot draft some kind of legislation, either write a bill, or consider and study a joint resolution introduced by me. I introduced Senate Joint Resolution 117, dealing with less-than-carload traffic. I recognized it was incomplete. We might try to write a bill, or we might set that joint resolution down for a hearing, gather all the information possible, and write a bill afterward. In that, I shall defer to the views of the chairman of the com-

I hope I have to some extent illuminated this subject for the benefit of any Senators who perhaps may not have been so familiar with it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas has illuminated the subject, as he always illuminates any subject which he discusses; but to my mind he has not been conclusive as to what the Senate should do at this time in connection with the matter.

I raised the question on the motion of the Senator from Montana to disagree to the committee amendment not because I was in favor of the committee amendment but because it seemed to me that it presented a question which should be dealt with in connection with the pending bill or any other comprehensive bill dealing with transportation which is to be considered by the Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. So far as I have heard the Senator from Missouri, he is laboring under the same difficulty under which I find myself, but he just made a statement which it seems to me ought to afford an avenue of escape. He suggests something which would accomplish the same thing, apparently, the committee desires. He suggested that we were going to have some legislation to remedy a practice which we all admit is bad, and, so far as I have heard, everyone admits that it is illegal under existing law. Then why is any legislation necessary? Why is this practice not stopped now? If it takes legislation to stop it, why can it not be done by a sentence, almost? Why legalize what is claimed now and admitted to be a parasitical condition?

Mr. REED rose.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will yield to the Senator from Kansas in just a moment. I agree with the Senator from Nebraska 100 percent in the statement which he has just made. If, as the Senator from Nebraska believes, and as I believe, this practice is now illegal, it is the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the officials of the Department of Justice to eradicate it. But if they do not do that by the enforcement of the law, as the law is now on the statute books, or by construction of the law, then it seems to me that, while passing a comprehensive transportation bill, Congress ought to make the intent of the law unmistakable.

I am now glad to yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. WHEELER. If the Senator will permit, the subject is not so simple as it looks on its face.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that was exactly what I was about to say to the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Missouri, it is not so simple as it looks.

Mr. WHEELER. It is easy to stand on the floor and say, in one sentence, that this is illegal and is improper, and that we ought to legislate against it. A great many of these problems look simple until the other side has been heard. I am frank to say that every member of the committee felt exactly as the Senator from Missouri has felt, but when we went into the question, the truth is it was found that it is not illegal per se at the present time. It is the way in which it is done that makes it illegal.

The committee did not have sufficient evidence before it to draft legislation, and we did not have sufficient information to determine just what ought to be done to correct these practices. As I stated, the matter was brought to our attention after we had struggled with the problem for practically 3 months, and then the committee asked the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Reed] to go to the Commission and get their views, and have them work the matter out. When it was brought back to the committee, those who had been advocating that we have some provision on the subject in the bill came to us and said, "This is terrible, and we do not want it." The result was that the committee came to the conclusion that before we could legislate intelligently upon the matter we had to have more information. If any Senator knows more about it than we do, and has some scheme which will take care of the situation, no member on the committee will object to considering it. We are all seeking a remedy. But we all felt, after giving the matter much time and study, and after taking it up with the Commission and finding the Commission divided with reference to certain phases of the matter, that we did not have sufficient information intelligently to draft legislation dealing with the subject, and we wanted to go into it further.

I assure the Senator from Missouri that it is the intention of every member of the committee to take this matter up and make it a special order of business.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from Montana, and to the Senate, that I would not wish anything I might say in connection with any part of the pending bill to be taken as in the slightest degree a reflection on the industry or the intelligence or the great knowledge of either the Senator from Montana or the members of his committee. I know how hard they have worked on this subject. I know that they have labored and have patriotically and intelligently cooperated in the formation of the bill now before the Senate. They have conducted a great many hearings. Nevertheless, when all is said and done, the bill is a tremendously comprehensive measure, which is being presented to be the basic law on the subject of transportation in the United States for years to come.

I am perfectly aware of the fact that the old, original act creating the Interstate Commerce Commission has been regarded as a magna carta on the subject ever since the Interstate Commerce Commission was established. I know that in all of its operations with regard to water-borne commerce, or truck-carried commerce, or anything of the kind, the Interstate Commerce Commission has always been able to take refuge behind that law and say that they were bound by the law and the precedents established under the law; and that, therefore, as I stated yesterday, it has become a railroad-minded commission.

Mr. President, I am not accusing the Senator from Montana, or his committee, of trying to exert undue pressure for the immediate passage of the bill, because I do not think they are doing so. But following what is after all a rather limited discussion and a rather limited knowledge by the Members of the Senate of a measure containing 206 pages, we are now to be called upon to deal with this vast subject and set up a basic body of law. I submit that we ought to consider, and at least attempt to negative the ill effects of such a situation as has been admitted here on all sides to be in violation of the present law. At least we ought not to permit an arrangement to continue which will perpetuate a situation which ought to be generally recognized as being in violation of the law.

Therefore, Mr. President, I am not in sympathy with the committee amendment. If I were in sympathy with the first part of it I would certainly not be in sympathy with the "provided further" clause, beginning at the bottom of page 49, providing for pooling arrangements. It does not seem to me to be a subject as to which Congress ought to legislate at this time in connection with the pending bill.

The Senator from Nebraska said he believed the present practice to be in violation of law. So do I. The Interstate Commerce Commission and the Department of Justice have shown by their action and by their attitude that they do not conceive these practices to be in violation of the law. Therefore, while we are passing a comprehensive law why should we not specifically declare in lieu of the pending amendment that such arrangements in the formation of forwarding companies between the railroads are illegal? Then, if the Senator from Montana's committee has a chance to consider it, and the Senate has a chance to legislate on it, the Congress could have that subject before it for consideration.

Any Senator who has observed the course of such bills must realize that in considering this omnibus bill—a bill designated as being a bill for the relief of the railroads, which, in my judgment, should also be designated as a bill for the emasculation of water transportation and truck transportation in this country—containing an amendment regulating forwarding companies, when we propose amendments to the act now proposed we encounter hazards not to be presently estimated. These difficulties of consideration are recognized in the report of the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce in the consideration of the pending bill in committee, in its passage through the Senate, and will be recognized in its progress through the body at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. REED. I wish to call to the attention of the Senator from Missouri the fact that the Railway Express Agency, successor to the old Adams Express Co., the United States Express Co., the American Express Co., the Wells-Fargo Express Co., the South Express Co., is a wholly owned railroad agency, whereas the fine, old-time express companies I have named were privately owned. They were succeeded by the Railway Express Agency, which pooled all the express traffic, and the agency, which is owned by the railroads, is rendering a unified and better service, and no one ever considered that the Railway Express Agency was illegal in any way, so far as I ever knew.

My own desire would be that the railroads either arrange to handle their less-than-carload freight through an expansion of the Railway Express Agency facilities or to provide similar facilities of their own.

There are many differences of opinion, but I do not want the statement of the Senator from Missouri that this practice is unlawful per se to go unchallenged, because there exists a comparable agency, the Railway Express Agency, entirely owned by the railroads, operating satisfactorily, and no one contends that it is illegal.

I may urge upon the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Nebraska that this is not an easy question to settle. It is a difficult question. It is "a tough baby" to deal with, believe me! But the distinguished Senator from Montana, the chairman of the committee, and myself have made an agreement to undertake to see what we can do with the aid of our associates on the committee. I do not know what we can do.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I am simply relying on the statements which the Senator from Montana made. The Senator from Kansas said on this floor not more than 10 minutes ago that these wholly owned subsidiaries of the railroad companies, these forwarding companies, were engaged in discrimination. I did not say-and I want to correct the Senator from Kansas in that respect-I did not say that it was illegal for the railroad companies to own the forwarding companies. What I said—and I was quoting the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Montana when I said itwas that it was illegal for them to own these companies and to discriminate in rates. I say it is illegal for a forwarding company owned 100 percent by a number of railroads to be able to obtain lesser rates for individuals or for municipalities or for regions than can be obtained by people who do not patronize forwarding companies.

Mr. REED and Mr. MINTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Kan-

Mr. REED. Apart for the moment from the question of advisability, I may say that the illegality of the present situation lies in the fact that a creature of a railroad company is handling business at a lower rate and a different rate.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And is able to discriminate against individuals and localities or sections.

Mr. REED. And is able to discriminate as between individuals. Those are the illegal practices that are going on. I agree that there is no reason why the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Department of Justice should not now, if they choose, undertake to bring action against both the railroad companies and the forwarding companies which are responsible for these illegal practices.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And yet, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, we are being asked by this very committee amendment already drawn, as the Senator himself has said, by the Interstate Commerce Committee, actually to legalize those practices.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President, the amendment does not legalize those practices. If the Senator from Missouri will permit me, I will say that I think the Interstate Commerce Committee which drew the amendment, as well as the chairman of the committee and myself, feel that this particular section is incomplete and faulty. But it does not legalize any presently illegal practice. That is where I want to draw the line in respect to the statement of the Senator from Missouri. There is nothing in the amendment which, if adopted, would create or continue or permit an illegal practice. But it is not exactly what I personally would like to have. As the chairman has said, the question is not so simple as it seems to be. It is quite a difficult question to deal with.

There is virtue in consolidating less-than-carload shipments into carloads if it can be done legally, and I think it can be done legally. As a matter of fact back in the days when we had the coordinator, he created several regional committees composed of railroad officials. I hold in my hand their last report. It is signed by the traffic vice presidents of the Union Pacific, the Pennsylvania Railroad, and the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railroad as a committee speaking for all the railroads. The question is not a new one. Its report was written 5 years ago. I shall read only one of the conclusions of the committee.

(1) The formation of one or two national grand pools is not recommended. This does not, however, imply that the consolidation of rail L. C. L., rail express and forwarder freight should not be undertaken by individual railroads or groups of railroads, where it is territorially practicable and economical to perform a complete service.

So we have a concurrence in principle of the railroads themselves through their committee in the idea that the present system of handling the less than carload ought to be improved, and that it can be improved if the railroads can agree, but the trouble is the railroads can never agree, and that is why the burden of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Congress is so heavy.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Since the question has come up I should like very briefly to express my own opinion as to the transportation policy which should be pursued by the United States of America. My notion, Mr. President-and it is very intimately involved in the question which is before the Senate in the pending amendment—my idea is that the transportation problem in the United States is a problem of such tremendous national importance that it transcends the interest of any transportation company, whether it be a railroad company, or a steamship company, or a barge line, or an air-line company, or a truck company.

It is a matter of such far-reaching importance that it has imposed upon it a very definite public interest which in a proper sense would take away from the transportation situation the view which I have always held, that any ordinary business should be operated by private business and should have as little public regulation as possible. But, Mr. President, the subject of transportation, which involves so vitally the life of the United States, is a tremendous question.

I should be glad to see, and I think the logic of events must finally dictate, a transportation monopoly in this country. I believe that all the agencies of transportation must finally be brought into an articulated whole, under the very strictest public regulation.

I have no animus against the railroads. I realize that millions of Americans have made investments in railroads. I realize that the railroad industry is a tremendous and very vital industry. I realize that millions of Americans are employed by the railroad industry. However, if I believed that the time had come when the railroads had become obsolete, as the stagecoaches became obsolete, I should think that the investors in the railroads and the men employed on the railroads would have to find new employment or new means of investment, and that the progress of the country would have to go forward.

I hold no such view. I do not believe the time has come, and I do not believe the time will come for many years, when the railroads will not be the fundamental basis and the most vital section of the Nation's transportation system. Therefore, Mr. President, I say that if such a thing should happen as the establishment of a monopoly of the transportation system under national control, I should be perfectly willing for the railroads to have the controlling voice in that monopoly.

However, I think the conclusion is inescapable that the only basis upon which we can grant favors or establish rates for the railroads, truck lines, water-transportation lines, or air lines, is upon the basis of service to the shippers and the public of the United States. When I say that some day I think there ought to be a transportation monopoly in the country under rigid governmental control, I am not saying that I should like to see the time come. I do not profess to be smart enough to solve the problem myself; but I should like to see the time come when a man at Bowling Green, Mo., Broken Bow, Nebr., or anywhere else in the United States, could go to one office and say he wanted to ship a bill of goods to St. Louis, Kansas City, Wichita, New York, Shanghai, or any other place in the world, and be told by an impartial adviser representing a transportation agency the very cheapest and best way in which to ship his goods. In other words, if it were desirable to ship his goods from Bowling Green, Mo., to St. Louis by truck, and there put them on a barge line to New Orleans, and then load them on an ocean vessel for transshipment to Shanghai, that ought to be his privilege. If it were cheaper for him to ship from Bowling Green to San Francisco by rail, he ought to know that fact. If, as happens to be true, it were cheaper for him to ship his goods by rail to Baltimore, and then put them upon an intercoastal vessel and send them around through the Isthmus of Panama and the Panama Canal to San Francisco, he ought to be advised of that fact.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator in just a moment.

So I have no bias whatever in favor of one means of transportation against another. My only objection to the bill is that it is a railroad bill. We are putting transportation under a railroad commission. We are deliberately hamstringing the intercoastal shipping and the inland waterways of the country, as well as the trucks, and we are leaving out the air lines, without any reason whatever for this particular discrimination except the existing "war scare."

Therefore, it seems to me that the question of the rights and privileges we grant to the railroads or permit the railroads to pursue in the way of organizing subsidiary companies and forwarding companies is very important.

I am glad to yield to the Senator from Kansas. I am sorry not to have yielded before, but I wanted to complete my thought.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Missouri has outlined quite an order. I am wondering whether he hopes to complete it during his first administration, or whether it will have to go over until his second administration. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I stated to the Senator from Kansas at the outset that I do not profess to be smart enough to solve the problem myself. I leave it to the very distinguished Committee on Interstate Commerce, which is willing to cover all subjects, as the bill does, including a number of subjects within the jurisdiction of other committees. I am not trying to reflect on the ability or wisdom of the Interstate Commerce Committee. I merely desire to say that when a subject of this importance comes before the Senate I do not think we ought to leave it for future consideration, because any provisions for regulating illegal practices omitted from the omnibus transportation bill now before the Senate will be very difficult to put in later.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President-

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator. I desire the floor later.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have concluded.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, does the Senator from Arizona wish to speak on the pending amendment?

Mr. ASHURST. No.

Mr. WHEELER. May we not first dispose of the amendment?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly. I yield the floor.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I should like to have a vote upon the suggestion which I have made, that the Senate reject the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Montana, on rejecting the portion of the committee amendment found on page 49, commencing with the word "Provided," in line 2 and continuing through the word "measures" in line 21.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the next matter is that part of the committee amendment beginning on page 49, line 21, with the words "Provided further," and continuing over to page 50, line 13, terminating with the word "carriers."

This language, like the language which we have just been discussing, was prepared by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The question involved is a mooted one, and is very important. I myself, as well as other Senators, should like to have more time to consider the matter. I ask that the Senate reject the part of the committee amendment to which I have referred.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, it is all part of one amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The object of the Senator is to reject the remainder of the committee amendment, is it not?

Mr. REED. Down to and including the words "such carriers" in line 13 on page 50.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the language referred to, together with the language we have just rejected, constitute one committee amendment?

Mr. REED. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that there are some amendatory words or sentences in the language referred to; but, so far as the effect is concerned, the language would be entirely inconsistent with the language beginning in line 2, page 49, with the words "Provided further," and extending to line 13 on page 50, ending with the word "carriers." I think we should eliminate both provisions.

Mr. NORRIS. We have rejected part of the committee amendment. The Senator now seeks to reject the remainder of the committee amendment. Is that true?

Mr. REED. That is all there is to it.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. BYRD. The action suggested would take out of the bill any reference to pooling of any character?

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I believe the Senate thought it was rejecting the committee amendment; but the committee intended that we should reject only a part of the amendment. The committee now wishes to reject the remainder of the committee amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.
Mr. NORRIS. Why not simply reject the whole committee amendment and get it over with?

Mr. WHEELER. I agree with the Senator. Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings with respect to this amendment be vacated, and that the Senate vote on the amendment as a

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next committee amendment which was passed over.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 50, at the beginning of line 16, it is proposed to insert the words "relating to pooling, division of earnings, traffic, or service, or any portion thereof."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I wish to say that this is practically the present law, and it merely takes care of present pooling arrangements which may be in effect at the present time between water carriers and railroads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment passed over.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 50, at the beginning of line 15, it is proposed to strike out "motor carrier, air carrier, or."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the committee amendments.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I shall probably earn the gratitude of the Senate by giving assurance that I shall not speak longer than 6 or 7 minutes. I know little about railroading, and probably the only point upon which I could confidently venture an opinion would be upon the so-called long-and-short-haul feature. That feature of the law has been the subject for many years of much diligent study on my part.

This bill comes to the Senate, so far as I am concerned, under favorable auspices. It was introduced by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], for himself and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN], and reported by the Senator from Montana. Ordinarily, any bill framed by those Senators would be given a most respectful examination; but I am not content with the language which has been employed in dealing with the long-and-short-haul clause.

It is not necessary here and now for me to enter into a discussion as to what is meant by the long and short haul, and it might be a waste of time for me, if I could, to recite the tedious history of the abuses which occurred under the long-and-short-haul discriminations. Therefore, while it is an interesting subject, I surely need do no more than say that it required years of patient and diligent work on the part of the Senators and Representatives from the Intermountain States to put an end to the abuses and injustices under the long-and-short-haul discriminations.

Those abuses began when the last spike was driven on the Union Pacific Railroad in 1869; they continued after the passage of the interstate commerce law of 1887; they still continued after 1910, when there was some relief, and even until about 1918, when more adequate relief was granted.

I should like to vote for this bill, but frankly I am perplexed. I fear that lurking within the references to the long-and-short-haul clause to be found on pages 180, 181, and 182 there may be phrases upon which later constructions may be put that would overthrow the work of 25 years to remove these abuses.

In all courtesy, I now address a question to my able friend the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, as to whether he would be content to have those provisions stricken out, so that, in any event, the law as to the long and short haul would remain as it now is.

The Senator from Montana knows, for I have said so on the floor of the Senate many times, that I regard him as an able lawyer. Able as he is, familiar as he is with this subject, devoted as have been his labors in connection with this bill, I still believe that lurking within the provision affecting the long and short haul, or in section 50, there is language that later may be distorted or misconstrued in such a way as to deprive citizens in the intermountain region of the measure of justice which they have secured after so long and desperate a contest. I am wondering if the Senator would view with any toleration a motion by me to strike out section 50 relating to the long-and-short-haul clause, so that the law would remain as it now is?

I am not going to offend the proprieties by pretending that I am more ardently in favor of the elimination of the longand-short-haul abuses than is the Senator from Montana, for I recognize he has been a leader in our efforts to secure relief from those abuses. Therefore, will the Senator, out of abundance of caution, agree to strike out section 50 of the bill?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I may answer the Senator by saying that I would be afraid to strike out section 50, because, if the section were stricken out, I am quite sure under the language of the bill the very object the Senator seeks to accomplish would not be accomplished.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is of opinion that it would be inadvisable to strike out the section?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes. I am very much afraid that to do so would completely destroy the old fourth section, or the so-called long-and-short-haul clause.

Mr. ASHURST. Quite all right.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say, for the information of the Senator, that the only reason I consented to the suggested amendment which went in the bill was because Mr. Campbell, who was formerly a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and who has led the fight for the intermountain territory

Mr. ASHURST. To prevent these abuses.

Mr. WHEELER. To prevent these abuses—wrote a letter and suggested the very amendment that we put in the bill. So it was only because the representative of the intermountain territory suggested, as I recall his language, that he, at least, could see no harm in the amendment, and it would not in any way endanger the bill, that the language as now found was inserted in the measure.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Montana advises that to strike out section 50 would promote the abuses rather than prevent them. Very well; I ask the Senator to address his attention to the suggestion to strike out all new matter; retain section 50, but on page 181 disagree to the amendment proposed there to strike out certain language in the existing law, and, on the same page, disagree to the amendment which proposes new matter. In other words, my desire and solicitude are to leave the law as to the fourth section as it

In expressing a doubt as to what may happen, I mean no reflection upon the labors of the committee. I appreciate that section 50 is advocated by my able friend from Kansas [Mr. Reed], whom I consider really to be one of my constituents, and who is so familiar with the State of Arizona that I would be inclined to respect his judgment on this subject.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. REED. I may say that I am more than familiar with Arizona. I have considerable money invested in the Senator's State.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator will receive a good interest rate on whatever he may have invested in Arizona. He will receive an adequate return in due time.

Mr. REED. May I inquire of the Senator from Arizona if he ever heard of anybody earning a return on an investment out of Arizona?

Mr. ASHURST. I know that those persons who invest in Arizona receive returns for their investments; they never need worry about investments which they make in Arizona.

Mr. President, I shall not presume to set up my inconclusive judgment on this matter against the judgment of such men as the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Reed], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN], and the other members of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, but frankly I do not feel easy about the proposed provisions. I know only too well how these fugitive phrases are distorted by some of those who may later construe them. I know only too painfully that when we enact a law, though there are just as many good lawyers in the Senate as there are in any given number of men elsewhere, that we do not have the last say, but those who subsequently construe the law are the ones who may ultimately determine any doubt.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. ASHURST. Cetainly. Mr. WHEELER. Let me say that the language used was drafted and recommended by those who will construe it. They tell me that it does not in any way, shape, or form amend the law except in respect of the proviso-

Mr. ASHURST. That is on page 181.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; on page 181, which reads:

And provided further. That tariffs proposing rates subject to the provisions of this paragraph may be filed when application is made to the Commission under the provisions hereof, and such application and tariffs shall be handled in accordance with the provisions of paragraph (1) of section 28 of this act.

I am informed by experts of the Commission and those who will pass upon it that all that means is that when there is no controversy-and in about 80 percent of these applications there is no controversy—the tariffs will go immediately into effect. When there is a controversy, the Commission would suspend the rates until a hearing could be held, and the rates would not go into effect at all.

Now, the equidistant clause-

Mr. ASHURST. Please explain that.

Mr. WHEELER. The equidistant clause, as I understand, has nothing to do with the fourth section as it affects the Senator's part of the country or the intermountain territory. The Senator will recall that Mr. Eastman and the Interstate Commerce Commission have long been opposed to the repeal of the fourth section.

Mr. ASHURST. Quite true.
Mr. WHEELER. But they have been in favor of the repeal of the so-called equidistant clause, because they say it is unworkable, and is not of any value whatever; and it does not affect our section of the country or the antidiscrimination provisions in which the Senator and the intermountain country are interested.

Mr. ASHURST. Assurance given by the able Senator from Montana ought to be sufficient. Although I am not of a suspicious nature, I must observe that when wizards in the use of words, word milliners on the bench and on commissions, get through with a section they sometimes give it a vastly different meaning, purport, and effect than that which was intended by Congress.

Mr. WHEELER. The Interstate Commerce Commission has always been against the repeal of the fourth section.

Mr. ASHURST. Quite true. Ultimately, when the provisions of this section 50 are construed and begin to have application and effect, if it should be found that our protection against fourth-section discrimination is wiped away, my face would grow red, and the countenance of my learned friend from Montana will grow crimson.

Mr. WHEELER. I agree with the Senator.

Let me say to the Senator, as to section 2, which is stricken out at the bottom of page 181, that the experts of the Commission think it does not mean very much and it is not necessary to have it in the fourth section. However, if there is any question in the Senator's mind about it, I am perfectly willing to have it restored, and would ask that that be done. As I say, I have to take the word of the experts and of the Commission, and I have relied upon them.

Mr. ASHURST. A factor which has made the Senator from Montana a success is that he never arrogates to himself all wisdom, and is willing to listen to honest experts; likewise the little success, meager enough, which I have achieved has flowed in part from the fact that I frankly admit I do not know it all and am glad to be advised by experts in whom

I have confidence.

Therefore, if the Senator will consent, that the Senate shall disagree to the amendment beginning on line 24 of page 181 and ending with the word "competition" on line 5 of the next page, we would feel somewhat easier.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the Senator ask unanimous consent that the action on that amendment be reconsidered?

Mr. ASHURST. I would rather have the Senator from Montana do so.

Mr. WHEELER. In view of what the Senator from Arizona has said, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which paragraph (2) was stricken out shall be reconsidered, and that the paragraph be reinstated.

Mr. WHEELER. Page 181.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Montana to reconsider the vote on the committee amendment, beginning on page 181 and concluding on page 182, designated as paragraph (2)? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ASHURST. Then, Mr. President, am I correct in my understanding that the amendment, beginning with line 24 on page 181 and ending with line 5 on page 182, is rejected, and that that language is restored in the law?

Mr. WHEELER. The language is restored in the law. Mr. MILLER, Mr. REED and other Senators addressed

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield the floor. Mr. MILLER obtained the floor.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President-

Mr. MILLER. I understand that the Senator from Michigan has an amendment which is not controverted. I yield to him for the purpose of presenting that amendment only.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I have on the desk an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, line 23, after the words "United States", it is proposed to insert a colon and the following:

Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall apply to contract carriers by water in the transportation of commodities in bulk on the Great Lakes whose vessels during the normal course of voyage pass within the international waters between the States and Canada, and whose vessels compete in respect to the transportation of any such commodities in bulk with water carriers of a foreign country.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I desire to say that I have gone over this amendment with the Senator from Michigan, and we feel that it does exactly what the Interstate Commerce Commission said they intended to do. I can see no objection to adopting the amendment. It merely exempts the bulk carriers that compete with foreign shipping on the Great Lakes. Not being able to regulate the rates of the foreign ships on the Great Lakes, we agree that our bulk carriers, which come in competition with them should not be regulated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan

[Mr. Brown].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Montana for accepting this amendment. I fully discussed it vesterday.

I also desire to state, before taking my seat, that while the amendment is presented in my name, it represents the views of the Senators from the Great Lakes States, particularly my colleague [Mr. Vandenberg], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Lundeen], the Senators from Wisconsin [Mr. La FOLLETTE and Mr. WILEY], the Senators from Illinois [Mr. Lucas and Mr. SLATTERY], the Senators from Ohio [Mr. Don-AHEY and Mr. TAFT], the Senator from New York [Mr. MEAD], the Senators from Pennsylvania [Mr. Davis and Mr. Guffey], and others; and I wish to acknowledge their part in getting this matter straightened out for the benefit of the Great Lakes area.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, I wish to present to the Senate an amendment in the nature of a substitute for section 30, on page 120 of the bill.

I make no pretense of being an expert. I am not a member of the committee which has studied this bill and has reported it; but I desire to call the attention of the Senate to some facts which I think should be taken into consideration by the Senate in the passage of legislation of this nature. I want to talk to the Senate for a while from the standpoint of the shipper and from the standpoint of the consumer of the country.

This bill has had serious, careful, intelligent, and able consideration, and was born as a result of the work of the committee which was appointed for the primary purpose of rehabilitating the railroads.

A few days ago the Senator from Missouri said that the chief trouble in this country was the lack of shippers. The chief trouble of the railroads in the Nation today is due to the inequitable, unjustified, and indefensible rate system that has been built up. This bill carries with it certain provisions for the investigation of discriminations in freight rates, but that is about all it does.

The amendment I am proposing in this case is to the ratemaking section, section 30. The amendment has been printed, and I first want to call the attention of the Senate to its provisions. It adopts the section as it appears in the printed bill, with this addition:

In order that the public at large may enjoy the benefit and economy afforded by each type of transportation, the Commission shall permit each type of carrier or carriers to reduce rates so long as such rates maintain a compensatory return to the carrier or carriers after taking into consideration overhead and all other elements entering into the cost to the carrier or carriers for the service rendered. It shall be unlawful to establish rates for any type of transportation which shall not be compensatory, as herein defined, whether such rates are established to meet competition of other types of transportation or for other purposes.

The proposal falls into two sections. One is the cost feature of the rate, the cost of operation of the rate. The second one is urged for the purpose of preventing the establishment of out-of-pocket cost rates. It is particularly to the question of the cost of transportation that I desire to address my remarks.

Under existing law the Interstate Commerce Commission approves rates. When it is said the Commission establishes rates, that is a misstatement. It establishes nothing except in rare instances. The Commission approves rates which have been carrier-initiated. Practically every rate is first written by a carrier, filed with the Commission, and approved by the Commission.

As stated on the Senate floor a few days ago, the railroads of this Nation have become so involved and so enmeshed in their own tariffs and in their own rate structures that it is almost impossible to extricate them. A major operation may be necessary to extricate them.

In considering rates the Interstate Commerce Commission has adopted five principles. One is the economic and geographic conditions of the place of origin of the shipment, The second is the policy of the carrier, and bear that in mind. The third is the policy of the Government as expressed in its statutory enactments. The fourth is cost of service and value of the commodities transported. fifth is the effect of competition.

Under that formula-and if it is defensible, I want someone to defend it—this country has been laid off into zones or territories known as the official territory, or eastern region; the southern region, the western region, the southwestern region, and the mountain region. Artificial lines have been established defining those regions, and different freight rates apply in all of them. I propose to show to the Senate that it costs more to transport commodities in the official territory than it does in the southern and southwestern and mountain territories; yet we sit here and permit this discrimination to exist.

In connection with what I am saying I expect, before the conclusion of the consideration of the bill, to offer an amendment striking out the words "unjust and undue" in the declaration of policy on page 6 of the bill, and the same words on page 26 of the bill, "undue and unjust discrimination," because they are relative terms. There is no such thing as an unjust discrimination. If there is a discrimination, it is a discrimination. We cannot employ relativity in discussing discrimination.

The freight rate in southern territory, territory lying south of the Ohio River, with the exception of parts of Virginia and Maryland, is 39 percent more than the rate in the official territory. In the western territory it is 47 percent more. In the southwestern territory, in the States of Oklahoma, Texas, and Arkansas, 75 percent more is paid than is paid in the official or eastern territory. In the mountain and Pacific regions the shippers pay 71 percent more than is paid in the official territory.

What are the earnings of the railroads in those territories? Taking the official territory as the test and figuring it as 100 percent, the southern railroads earn 30.7 percent more than the roads in the official territory; the western trunk lines earn 36.3 percent more than the roads in the official territory; the southwestern roads earn 31.1 percent more; and the mountain and Pacific roads earn 19 percent more.

The rates in those regions, however, as I have just pointed out, run from 39 to 75 percent higher, and the roads earn from 19 to 36 percent more. Who is paying the bill? It is the shippers and the people who live in those regions.

The President of the United States recognized this, and I wish to read from his message of April 27. I know the members of the Committee on Interstate Commerce desire to destroy discrimination, but notwithstanding what the President has said, we have done nothing along that line. This is what the President stated about that question:

Herewith I submit a survey entitled "Supplemental Phases of the Interterritorial Freight Rate Problem of the United States,' survey was conducted by the Board of Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority, pursuant to Executive Order No. 6161 (June 8, 1933), by which are delegated to it certain powers granted to me by sections 22 and 23 of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933. I am also herewith submitting a letter from the Tennessee Valley Authority, dated the 6th day of February 1939, forwarding the aforesaid survey to me, explaining its relation to the initial report on this subject submitted to the Congress on June 7, 1937.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. The man who made that survey was Mr. Aldridge, was it not?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. And he has recently been appointed a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. MILLER. Yes; and his appointment gives some faint hope.

Mr. WHEELER. The fact that he has been appointed a member of the Commission certainly should furnish some hope to the southern people and also to the Senators from the Northwest. But I call attention to the fact that the Committee on Interstate Commerce was extremely sympathetic with the views which the Senator has expressed, and at the request of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Hill] and other southern Senators we inserted in the proposed legislation a provision calling upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to make an immediate study of the subject, and also to make and put into operation such order as they found necessary against the discriminations which have taken place.

Mr. MILLER. That is true, and I am entirely familiar with the provision, and congratulate the committee upon that step. However, I take the position, with all due deference to the terms of the bill, that we have not gone far enough, that we ourselves owe it to the people of this country to destroy any vestige of authority on the part of anyone to permit a discrimination.

The President said further:

This letter also restates the views of the Authority on the effects upon our national economy of the regional freight-rate discrimination disclosed in the two reports, and urges the adoption of appropriate legislation to eliminate this discrimination,

If a discrimination exists, why not direct that it be destroyed? But, so long as we retain in the bill the words "undue and unjust" as defining discrimination, we will continue to have discrimination.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. I think we would have to retain these words "undue and unjust" against which the Senator inveighs. The Supreme Court has said that there is such a thing as an unjust discrimination. If one ships a carload from one point to another, he gets a lower rate than if he puts in a drop shipment from one point to another. That is a discrimination, but it is not an unjust discrimination.

Mr. MILLER. That would not be a discrimination as to the classes of freight.

Mr. MINTON. It is a discrimination.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield. Mr. HATCH. I have not heard all the Senator's remarks, but did he say that under the terms of the pending bill the discriminations which exist, and which we all know exist. are retained or made permanent? Am I correct in my understanding?

Mr. MILLER. No; I did not say that they are retained or made permanent. I said the committee was to be congratulated upon the step it had taken in directing an investigation to determine whether or not discriminations exist, and in directing the Commission to destroy or remove the discrimi-

Mr. HATCH. Then, the position of the Senator is that the bill merely does not go far enough?

Mr. MILLER. That is all.

Mr. WHEELER. I should really like to have the Senator or someone else on this floor tell me just what language should be written into the bill which would go further than what is now in it. It is easy, in making a political speech, to say that we want certain legislation, and want to do this and want to do that, but it is quite another thing for one, after he has made the speech or made the recommendation, to write the language which will actually accomplish what he wants to accomplish without discriminating against someone else or some other community.

The Congress of the United States cannot make rates. The Congress must provide for a commission which will make rates. The Congress lays down broad general policies for that commission to follow. In the pending bill we have said to the Commission, "We want you immediately to investigate the situation, and then we want you to issue orders which will correct the situation."

The Senate cannot investigate to ascertain whether discriminations exist in one particular territory or in another particular territory, because if we were to do that we would have time for nothing else; we would spend all our time for the next 10 years investigating to determine whether discriminations exist here, there, or somewhere else throughout the United States, so that we could frame legislation in an effort to correct the situation.

I agree with the statements made by the Senator, and I am in sympathy with his views and purposes, but I say that the Congress, in the proposed legislation, has gone as far as it is humanly possible to go. We have done all we can do to frame language to correct the situation.

I wish to say something else in reference to the Senator's proposed amendment. I agree with the purpose of the amendment; but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that we submitted the amendment to members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and they told us that the language used in the amendment would in many instances make it necessary for them to increase rates rather than to lower them.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, I appreciate the position of the committee; I appreciate the magnitude of the task it has had to perform; but I do not wish to let pass unchallenged the statement concerning political speeches and no constructive suggestions being made. I never made a political speech in my life.

Mr. WHEELER. I did not wish my remarks to be interpreted in the manner the Senator has indicated. The Senator read a statement, however, to which I made reference.

Mr. MILLER. No: Mr. President, I know the Senator did not have that thought in mind. However, I think that, if the Senate will bear with me in my blundering way, I can point out the fact that the cost feature ought to be included in the measure.

It is true that the Interstate Commerce Commission says that if my amendment were adopted some rates would have to be revised and probably some would have to be raised. Let us see whether or not that is so.

I pointed out that the revenues of the railroads in the discriminated-against sections of this country were greater than in the official territory.

What is the cost of transportation in those territories? The cost per ton per mile, as shown in the report prepared by the Tennessee Valley Authority, taking the eastern or official territory as the basis, is as follows: We find that in the southern territory the cost is 91.7 percent of the cost of transportation in the official or eastern territory. In the western trunk-line area it is 96.6 percent of the cost in official territory. In the Mountain-Pacific area it is 114.2 percent. In the southwestern region it is 96.8 percent. Notwithstanding the cost of transportation per ton per mile in that territory is less than it is in the eastern territory, yet the Commission, which we are all so willing to trust to iron out this matter, has approved rates which make the people of my section pay 75 percent more in freight rates than the people in the official territory pay.

I should like to call the attention of the Senate to some other figures.

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?
Mr. MILLER. I yield.
Mr. TRUMAN. Does the Senator know that the greatest number of receiverships of railroads exists in the southwestern territory and in the western territory?

Mr. MILLER. I do not have the figures, but no doubt what the Senator says is true. I know it to be true if the Senator from Missouri says it is, but, be that as it may, there is probably a good reason for it. Bankruptcy is not always produced by the rates. No doubt the southwestern railroads are bankrupt because the people there cannot pay the freight. If the rates in the southwestern region were reduced to the level of the rates in the official territory those railroads would not be bankrupt very long. I am sure that is so. The reason they are bankrupt is that our people simply cannot pay the freight both ways. The cost feature has not entered into the fixing of the rate.

I am not going to take the time of the Senate to go into a long discussion of the matter, but I wish to refer Senators who are interested in this question just as much as I am to the report which I hold in my hand. They will find therein that the rule of the carriers in initiating rates is to fix the rates just as high as the traffic will bear. That is what the rule has been. The cost feature has not entered into the fixing of rates.

Mr. President, my amendment seeks to permit the carriers to lower their rates in accordance with the cost of transportation. If the amendment should be adopted the rates in the areas discriminated against would be lowered. because if the eastern railroads, the railroads in the official territory, are operating without receiverships, and are charging lower rates than are charged in our territory, whereas in our territory the cost of transportation to the railroads is less, the adoption of my amendment would mean that the rates in our territory would be lowered in accordance with the compensation theory.

I call attention for a moment to some of the glaring discrepancies or discriminations which exist. I refer to the same volume, page 18, to which I previously made reference. I wish to call the attention of the people of the United States to some of the things that we as a Congress and the famed Interstate Commerce Commission have permitted to be done.

The distance from Nortonville, Ky., to Enfield, Ill., is 104 miles. I shall cite a few instances in the territory which is discriminated against. Enfield, Ill., is in the official territory. Nortonville, Ky., is in the southern territory. The rate for that 104 miles is 64 cents.

From Jeffersonville, Ind., to Indianapolis, Ind., within the official territory, the distance is 3 miles greater, but the rate is 58 cents, a difference of 6 cents per 100 pounds on firstclass freight.

The distance from Madisonville, Ky., to Terre Haute, Ind., where the artificial line between the official and the southern region is crossed, is 159 miles. The rate is 76 cents.

From Terre Haute, Ind., to Huntington, Ind., within the favored territory, a distance of 156 miles, the rate is 67 cents. or a saving of 9 cents.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the RECORD at this point, as a part of my remarks, tables 5, 6, 7, and 8 contained in the volume from which I have been reading, merely to show the effect of the discrimination which exists in the various regions both interterritorially and intraterritorially.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Note.—The first-class rates shown in the foregoing table between Kentucky or North Carolina points and official territory stations are not applicable in connection with the Exceptions to Southern Classification or the commodity column ratings of their respective tariffs. When the exceptions or columns are used, the first-class rates in these examples are from 2 percent to 17 percent higher than those shown, depending on the distance of the southern origin or destination from the rate border. No attempt is made to cover completely the many border-line problems and adjustments which are a part of the whole rate set-up.

¹ Difference in favor of official territory.

Mr. MILLER. I should like to call attention to one other situation. I wish to refer to the southwest region in which we in Arkansas find ourselves. From Texarkana, Ark., in the southwest region, to San Angelo, Tex., within the southwest region, a distance of 454 miles, it costs $1.70 to transport 100 pounds of freight.

From Decatur, Ill., in the official territory, to Little Rock, Ark., in the southwest territory, a distance of exactly the same mileage, it costs $1.54, or a differential of 16 cents.

The record is replete with just such instances, only much more glaring than those I have heretofore shown.

On page 46 of the report the population in the various rate territories is shown. One of the things upon which the rate is based is population; 50.9 percent of the population of the United States lives in the eastern territory; 16 percent lives in the southern territory; 9.35 percent lives in the southwestern territory; 14 percent lives in the western trunk-line territory; and 9.09 percent lives in mountain-Pacific territory.

Fewer people will live there than now live there unless we can correct these discriminations.

I desire to know, in all frankness, why a carrier should not be permitted to reduce its rates in accordance with the cost of the service rendered. If it be true that carriers can do business for less money in the Southwest and in the southern and western regions, why not give the shippers the benefit of the lower cost?

That is all the amendment proposes to do. The other part of the amendment merely provides that out-of-pocket tariffs below the cost of transportation may not be established for the purpose of putting a competitor out of business.

Mr. President, I wish to call attention to a statement on page 48 of the report to which I have referred. It states the situation so succinctly and so clearly that I hope I may have the attention of the Senate while I read the statement of the underlying reasons for the discrimination and the conditions arising therefrom.

The report says:

The magnetic pull of the territory is effective in the case of raw materials and partly finished goods because of favorable rates on this in-bound traffic from outlying territories.

Mr. President, under our tariff and transportation system a well-planned looting of the South and the Southwest of their resources is going on in the Nation today, and has been in progress for years. The Negro in the South was freed from physical slavery many years ago; and yet the greatest economic slavery ever imposed upon any people was clamped upon us.

Let me read an article which appeared in the Memphis Commercial Appeal, written by Mr. George Morris, a man assigned to Washington by that great newspaper:

The drive to compel equalization of freight rates in the Southeast and Southwest, which began with enthusiasm in the early days of Congress, has been completely abandoned.

That was true at that time.

It was defeated within the House Commerce Committee, and the credit or blame lies with the railroads and manufacturers of the Southeast and Southwest.

Let me digress long enough to compliment the able junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. Hill] for the hearings which he, as chairman of a subcommittee, conducted on that question. He has rendered an outstanding and distinct service to the people of the South and Southwest-and, for that matter, to the people of the Nation-in calling attention to the conditions which exist:

Reading further:

Chambers of commerce, freight traffic associations, and other organizations representing merchants, shippers, and individual consumers who carry the burden of discriminatory freight rates made a valiant fight, but they were no match for the southern railroads.

What was the cause of the attitude of the southern railroads? It was the increase in freight rates.

The temporary organization of the people suffering from dis-crimination could not compare to the permanent organization subsidized by the railroads.

Those appearing before the committee made out their case. They showed that the Southeast is penalized to the extent of 39 percent in freight charges and the Southwest 75 percent as compared with eastern or official territory. But when the protests were finished the railroads put in appearance. They did not appear personally; they stood back with assumed indifference.

This is the key to the whole situation, and makes plain the most cunning plan ever devised to take raw materials out of the South and impoverish that section of the country.

They stood back with assumed indifference while shippers of raw materials took the stand and protested any change in existing arrangements.

Why? Because the shipment of raw materials moving from the South and Southwest into the official or favored territory takes a favored rate.

Reading further from the report to which I have previously

The territorial rate barriers, however, effectively insulate against this magnetic pull of the official territory on manufactured prod-ucts because of unfavorable rates on finished goods moving into the latter territory.

Can Senators imagine such a discriminatory situation as that being tolerated in this America of ours?

Mr. President, we talk about leaving all discretion with the Interstate Commerce Commission, when it has deliberately built up a system of freight rates which saps our territory of its raw products and prevents us from shipping into the same territory manufactured goods in competition. Those are the conditions. This unbiased report says so. The statement in the report is undisputed and undenied:

Furthermore, these barriers do not operate reciprocally as will be remembered from the discussion in part III. It will be recalled that it was explained how the official territory shippers can come into the other territories on somewhat lower levels of rates, mile into the other territories on somewhat lower levels of rates, mile for mile, than shippers residing in those territories have to pay for shipping similar articles wholly within their own territories. Thus, one has here something remarkably similar to the working of a protective tariff, to the extent that certain favored interests effectively strive to protect themselves at home while retaining privileges

Mr. President, I shall not consume more of the time of the Senate. I appreciate the attention and consideration given me, but I wish to insist upon my amendment. The amendment can do no harm. It may do good. There is no reason why the Interstate Commerce Commission should not be directed to take into consideration the cost of the service. That is what the amendment would provide. The second part of the amendment would simply prevent the establishment of rates for the purpose of driving a competitor out of

I ask for favorable consideration of my amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, because of my affection for the Senator from Arkansas, I wish it were possible for me to say that I agree to the amendment. However, after looking into the decisions of the Commission, and after reading the report which was made by Commissioner Eastman to the House committee on a similar provision, I must ask the Senate to vote against the amendment, for the reason that Commissioner Eastman is satisfied that instead of reducing rates the effect of the amendment in many instances would be to raise rates.

For example, if we say to a railroad, "You must obtain the cost of transportation out of every portion of your line," the little branch lines will have to raise their rates in order to obtain the cost of transportation. The same thing would be true in many other instances.

I call attention to a statement by Commissioner Eastman. He said:

If this standard of "full cost" were applied to railroad charges, it would plainly preclude many of the rates made under "fourth-section relief," a great number of other rates, particularly on less-than-carload traffic, and most of present passenger fares. It might also prevent averaging of rates as between multiple-line and single-line or branch-line and main-line operations. If strictly applied to all forms of transportation, it would tend to eliminate competition, except where competitors have like costs of service, and to put all rates on the cost-of-service bases of the particular types of carriers involved. involved.

We realize that H. R. 2531 does not propose strict application of the rule, but only that the Commission give "due consideration to the undestrability" of permitting rates which fall below the "full cost" standard.

he amendment goes further than that.

So indefinite a provision, however, is confusing and embarrassing So indefinite a provision, however, is confusing and embarrassing to the administrating agency, for while in reality it lays down no rule, yet it leaves the agency continually open to the charge that it is disregarding the wishes of Congress. In passing upon applications for "fourth-section relief," for example, what would be "due consideration of the undesirability" of permitting rates lower than "full cost," in view of the fact that it is normally such rates which require this relief? require this relief?

The Commission fully appreciates the dangers of basing competitive rates on out-of-pocket costs under conditions of widespread competition, and is quite ready to believe that some such cost standard as H. R. 2531 proposes may prove, subject to reasonable limitations, to be necessary.

As I say, he points out, for instance, that the transcontinental railroads, which have put into effect rates extending from one end of the country to the other, and which come in competition with traffic through the Panama Canal, could immediately say they were out-of-pocket, and it would tend to raise the rates. Again it would be almost bound to raise the rates on the branch lines all over the country.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I think I understand the viewpoint of the Commission, but is it the Senator's viewpoint that necessarily the discrimination between regions must be endured?

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, no, not at all. I do not think that is the idea of Mr. Eastman. As a matter of fact, the amendment has nothing to do with discrimination. The speech did have to a large extent to do with discrimination.

Mr. GEORGE. I am taking the speech rather than the amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. The amendment, in my judgment, would not do what the Senator from Arkansas wants to do with reference to discrimination.

Let me say to the Senator that the amendments we have already put into the bill go much further toward accomplishing the purpose the Senator has in mind than would this amendment. I am in thorough accord with the statements made by the Senator from Arkansas with reference to discrimination. I think they ought to be stopped, and if the Commission pursues the investigation and follows what we have laid down in this bill, many of the discriminations between territories will be eliminated. A great many of them are absolutely arbitrary, and it seems to me without any justification.

Mr. GEORGE. I am glad to hear the distinguished Senator make that statement, because it seems to me to be more important, and I daresay it is more important as the coming days of the Congress must demonstrate, that we establish just and nondiscriminatory rates between the various regions than to continue even a rate that may not be justified in a particular region.

I wish to call the Senator's attention to the further fact—no doubt he has thought of it, but nevertheless I wish to call his attention to it—not only do we have the element of actual cost for carrying a ton a mile lower in the southern and southeastern and western regions than in the official region, not only is the profit greater to the carrier, but in view of the policy adopted by the Congress requiring substantially all those who have anything to ship, particularly all manufacturers, to conform to standards of uniform maximum hours and uniform minimum wages, and the ability of American labor to take care of proper differentials above the minimum, which I concede they ought to have, the discrimination in freight rates between regions simply ought to cease in this country, for if it does not cease great areas of the country will be hopelessly impoverished.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator I have argued continuously with reference to that proposition, in fact, all of us from the intermountain territory, including the Senators from Arizona and the Senators from Colorado and other States, have been fighting along that line, because we have felt that the discriminatory rates under the long-and-short-haul provision were absolutely destroying the intermountain territory in the interest of the coastal cities. I cannot see, for the life of me, why the railroads should want to build up the coast and destroy the inland territory, because, eventually, they get all the freight from the inland territory, but they cannot get all the freight from the coast no matter what their rates may be.

Mr. GEORGE. The point I wanted to make was that in a great Nation such as ours, covering so wide an area, the opportunity for uniform development and progress is far more important than the mere fact that a rate in a particular region might have to be slightly raised.

Mr. WHEELER. If I may be pardoned for interrupting the Senator, I agree entirely with that statement, and I say to the Senator that, as a matter of fact, that is what this bill seeks to do. We are seeking to put under the Interstate Commerce Commission the regulation of all forms of transportation rates. What is happening? A few people who are interested in shipping are coming here and saying, "We want this particular group to have a special dispensation to get lower rates for a particular territory." In so doing they are discriminating against the inland territory completely. I agree exactly with what the Senator has said, and I say that this bill if enacted will have an extremely beneficial effect on the country taken as a whole.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator thinks that it will make toward the equalization of rates in the various regions?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think there is any doubt about that at all, because that is the purpose of the bill; it is the intention of the bill.

Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the last provision of the amendment. It reads:

It shall be unlawful to establish rates for any type of transportation which shall not be compensatory, as herein defined, where such rates are established to meet competition of other types of transportation or for other purposes.

I am afraid if that language were put in the bill it would have, on the whole, a very detrimental effect on some of the water carriers, because unquestionably some of the water carriers at present are carrying freight upon the Great Lakes and in some other places at a price that at least the railroads say is less than compensatory. If we put in the bill a provision that the rates have to be compensatory and that shippers cannot carry freight for less than a compensatory rate, I am afraid we would find that that language would be used against the very object the Senator desires to accomplish.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. I can conceive of such a situation, but the idea is that a water carrier or a truck carrier or a railroad should not be allowed to establish a rate that is not compensatory. Transportation in this country cannot be built upon a hodge-podge system of rates that do not pay their way. I think rates are now ample to establish an adequate transportation system.

I quite agree with the able Senator that this bill will be quite helpful, but I do not see any reason, I am frank to say, why the compensatory rule should not be applied.

Mr. WHEELER. The compensatory rule is supposed to apply at the present time under the law.

Mr. MILLER. But I do not think it really does apply.

Mr. WHEELER. No; because of what has been done. While we are on the subject, I wish to call attention to the law that was written in 1920. When the shippers in the Mississippi Valley complain against the Interstate Commerce Commission they really should place the blame on the Congress of the United States and not on the Commission. So much has been said today about the Interstate Commerce Commission being railroad-minded, I ask why, in the name of goodness, is not the contention made in view of what the Congress did in 1920 and other times that the Congress of the United States is railroad-minded.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will be very glad to accept that criticism, and say that I think the trouble has been in the law and in the body of precedents it has created. My objection to this bill is that it imposes the old laws and the old body of precedents on the Commission with regard to other forms of transportation.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, with all due deference to my friend from Missouri, he is entirely wrong with reference to that, because quite the contrary has taken place. I can show the Senator or anybody else who wants to be fair about it how the water carriers will really be benefited under this bill. The most intelligent people among the water carriers are of that opinion and have so stated.

The fifth section of 15a says what?

Rates to permit carriers to earn fair return: In the exercise of its power to prescribe just and reasonable rates the Commission shall initiate, modify, establish, or adjust such rates so that carriers as a whole (or as a whole in each of such rate groups or territories as the Commission may from time to time designate) will, under honest, efficient, and economical management and reasonable expenditures for the maintenance of way, structures, and equipment, earn an aggregate annual net railway operating income equal, as nearly as may be, to a fair return upon the aggregate value of the railway property of such carriers held for and used in the service of transportation.

What does that mean? It means that whatever value the railroads put into their systems, whether or not they are worth that amount now, it was the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to try to raise rates to such a point that they should be permitted to earn a return upon the value found by the Interstate Commerce Commission, reproduction new or whatever it was.

See the fallacy of that legislation enacted by the Congress of the United States. I own property in the city of Butte. Let us say it cost me $100,000; but when the economic conditions of that community change so that I cannot rent the building for more than 10 percent of what I formerly received, have I any right to say that a rent commission shall rule that the tenants in the property must pay 6 percent upon $100,000? The same thing is true of the railroads when the conditions of the country have completely changed, and other forms of competing transportation have come in. After all, the rates for the railroads can be fixed only as high as the traffic will bear. The Congress was wrong in 1920 when it enacted this law.

When the water carriers come up, let me call attention to the court's decision. This is the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Dayton-Goose Creek case (263 U. S. 456, at p. 478):

The new act seeks affirmatively to build up a system of railways prepared to handle promptly all the interstate traffic of the country. It aims to give the owners of the railways an opportunity to earn enough to maintain their properties and equipment in such a state of efficiency that they can carry well this burden. To achieve this great purpose, it puts the railroad systems of the country more completely than ever under the fostering guardianship and control of the Commission, which is to supervise their issue of securities, their car supply and distribution, their joint use of terminals, their construction of new lines, their abandonment of old lines, and by a proper division of joint rates, and by fixing adequate rates for interstate commerce, and in case of discrimination, for intrastate commerce, to secure a fair return upon the properties of the carriers engaged.

That opinion was written by Chief Justice Taft.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. I quite agree with the Senator that the legislation embodied in the old Transportation Act has been a delusion. It has not proven to be what the Congress thought it would at the time. Under the present law the Interstate Commerce Commission must try to maintain the rates at a certain level in accordance with a certain value. That is the existing law. My amendment merely proposes that a carrier be permitted to reduce its rates. A carrier has difficulty in reducting its rates under existing law. I think we all agree upon that statement; do we not?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think the carriers have difficulty in reducing their rates if they come before the Commission. The only persons who are objecting to their reducing their rates, in many instances, are whom? The water carriers say, "You must not reduce your rate because it is an out-of-pocket rate," and now they are around the lobbies of the Senate saying, "We are working in the interest of the public. We are interested in the poor shippers, and we want to help you shippers." Yet every time the railroads want to reduce their rates the water carriers go before the Commission denouncing the proposal, raising Cain about it, and saying, "You people must not reduce your rates."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to say that so far as the inland waterways are concerned, the only communication I have had from water carriers happens to be from a water carrier which was formerly locally owned in St. Louis, Mo., on the Mississippi River, but two-thirds of whose stock, I am informed through proceedings in the Missouri Public Service Commission, is now owned by the Atlas Corporation, headed by Mr. Floyd Ogden, who is in favor of the Senator's bill.

Mr. WHEELER. That is true. Some of the shippers on the Mississippi River are in favor of the bill. General Ashburn appeared before the committee and testified for it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me further, it seems to me the thought may occur to the shippers in the Mississippi Valley that the fact that the company at one time was locally owned in St. Louis, Mo., and that it is now owned by a very large holding company, may have something to do with the fact that it may have taken different attitudes on this problem at different times.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not know anything about that. I cannot see that it should, because I should think the company would be interested in the same identical thing, regardless of whether it was locally owned or whether it was owned by somebody else. But I do not even know the gentleman of whom the Senator speaks. What I wanted to bring out for the benefit of those who are interested in the water carriers is this:

In 1933 we recognized that the rule which was adopted in section 15 (a) in 1920 was wrong. Then we wrote into the law a provision that in the exercise of the power to fix just and reasonable rates the Commission should give due consideration, among other factors, to the effect of rates on the movement of traffic. Let me call attention to the fact that under this legislation in 1920, and from 1920 to 1933, when a railroad wanted to reduce its rates, and some concern operating on the Mississippi River came to the Commission and said, "You should not reduce this rate," the Interstate Commerce Commission looked at this law and said to the water carrier, "The Congress has adopted a policy saying not that we should protect the water carrier out there and see that he stayed in business but that we should protect the railroads and foster the railroads to the same extent as anybody else in the country." That is what they said.

Mark well what I am saying to you today. I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but I say to you that if this bill is enacted the Commission will be in a position to say, "All forms of transportation are equal before us. That is the policy which has been declared by the Congress of the United States. It has said that we should give equal treatment to the railroads, and to the shipping interests upon the Mississippi River, and to the busses and trucks"; and that is what they have done under the bus and truck law.

When the Senator said this afternoon that the effect of this bill was to emasculate the bus and truck law, and to drive the busses and trucks out of business, where does he find the truck people and the bus people of the country? While at the outset they were opposed to this legislation, they have come to me and notified me that they have not any opposition to it; and what have the railroads said? They have said that the Interstate Commerce Commission is bus- and truck-minded, and is discriminating in favor of the busses and trucks against the railroads.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator having referred to me by pointing his finger at me—

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct; the Senator did not miss it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to say that if the Senator understood me as saying that the bus and truck law was being emasculated he misunderstood me, or else I misstated my position.

Mr. WHEELER. I suggest that the Senator read his speech. Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Very well. What I was saying was that the great inland-waterway transportation of the country, for which many of us fought for many years, and our fathers before us, and transportation by maritime means between the coasts of the United States, was being emasculated.

So far as I am concerned, I hold no brief whatever for the bus and truck industry of the United States. As a matter of fact, I have long been of the opinion that busses and trucks ought to be compelled to pay toll on the highways of the United States, and be very strictly regulated as common carriers, in differentiation from the ordinary use of highways by private citizens of the United States.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not know Mr. Ames. I do not remember ever seeing him. Probably he has appeared before the committee; but in testifying before the Mississippi Barge Line he said:

We have found that lack of regulation, instead of being a benefit, is a distinct disadvantage in the competitive struggle with the railroads.

I say to the Senator, as I said a moment ago, that when this legislation is enacted it will be found to be beneficial, because we are stating that it is the policy of the Congress of the United States that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall treat each and every one of these forms of transportation upon an equal basis; and no language could be written into law that more clearly directs that that should be done than we have done in the Interstate Commerce Committee.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. In the Senator's own time, and supplementing what the Senator has so well and so forcefully said—that it is the intention of the bill to protect each and every system of transportation or carriage of goods or persons—let me again call the attention of the Senator to the terms of the amendment. It simply says that-

In order that the public at large may obtain the benefit and economy afforded by each type of transportation-

Truck, boat, and railroad-

The Commission shall permit each type of carrier or carriers to reduce rates so long as such rates maintain a compensatory return to the carrier or carriers after taking into consideration overhead and all other elements entering into the cost to the carrier or carriers for the service rendered.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that so far as the first sentence of the amendment is concerned, I should not have any particular objection to it. It is the second provision which I think is objectionable.

Mr. MILLER. If the Senator has no objection, I am perfectly willing to strike out the last sentence.

Mr. WHEELER. If the Senator is willing to strike cut the last sentence, I am perfectly willing to take the amendment to conference and see what I can do with it.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, I should like to modify the amendment by striking out the last sentence, beginning on page 2 of the amendment, line 13, and as modified I offer the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has a right to modify his amendment.

Mr. MILLER. I understand that, and I am now offering the amendment in its modified form.

Mr. NORRIS. I congratulate the Senator on being willing to do that. As I see it, that relieves the amendment of any possible objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas as modified as a substitute for section 30.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to, as follows:

SEC. 30. It shall be the duty of the Commission in the exercise of its power to prescribe just and reasonable rates, to give due consideration, among other factors, to the effect of rates on the movement of traffic by the carrier or carriers for which the rates are prescribed; to the need in the public interest, of adequate and efficient transportation service by such carrier or carriers at the lowest cost consistent with the furnishing of such service; and to the need of revenues sufficient to enable such carrier or carriers under honest, economical, and efficient management, to provide such service. When used in this section the term "rates" means rates, fares, and charges and all regulations and practices relating thereto. In order that the public at large may enjoy the benefit and economy afforded by each type of transportation, the Commission shall permit each type of carrier or carriers to reduce rates so long as such rates maintain a compensatory return to the carrier or carriers after taking into consideration overhead and all other elements entering into the cost to the carrier or carriers for the service rendered.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, no one has been more interested in the removal of the discriminations in freight rates than has the Senator from Arkansas, and, as we noted this afternoon, in able and forceful fashion he pointed out the discriminations, particularly with reference to the South and the Southeast and Southwest. I wish to emphasize the fact that these discriminations exist not only in the South and the Southwest, but also in that great section of our country lying west of the Mississippi River, extending to the Pacific coast, and even to a lesser extent in New England. Is not that correct?

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Arkansas was generous in what he said about me, and about the subcommittee which held hearings on the freight-rate question. It would not have been possible for that subcommittee to bring in its report, or to have the provisions written into the bill which are now in the bill, but for the great interest in the matter of the removal of these discriminations on the part of the distinguished chairman of the committee, the Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler]. In every instance and at every step the chairman of the committee, in his powerful position, has given all the help he could in getting these provisions into the bill, and has done everything possible looking toward the removal of the discriminations. As the chairman of the subcommittee, I desire to express my thanks and appreciation to him

Mr. WHEELER. I thank the Senator.

ADDITIONAL REPORT OF RESCUES FROM THE SUBMARINE "SQUALUS"

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, it is now 2:20 p. m., and I should like to make a further brief statement with reference to the submarine disaster.

Thirty-two of the fifty-nine officers and men of the submarine are alive and well. This includes four officers and one civilian. Fourteen of these have already reached the surface. It takes an hour and a half to send below the diving bell, which can take seven to the surface at a time. Two trips have been made, and 14 have been brought to the surface.

Twenty-seven of the fifty-nine are unaccounted for. This includes one officer and two civilians. Probably they are in the after part of the submarine, which is flooded.

Of the seven already rescued, there was one officer, one civilian, and five enlisted men.

ADDITIONAL COPIES OF HOUSE HEARINGS ON SOCIAL SECURITY ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1939

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Lucas in the chair) laid before the Senate House Concurrent Resolution 25, which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That, in accordance with paragraph 3, section 2, of the Printing Act, approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to have printed for its use 5,000 additional copies of the hearings held before said committee during the current section. rent session on the bill entitled "Social Security Act Amendments of 1939."

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution. I make the request because the House expects to consider the bill tomorrow and the hearings should be printed and available for the Members of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was considered and agreed to.

REGULATION OF MODES OF TRANSPORTATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2009) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by extending its application to additional types of carriers and transportation and modifying certain provisions thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Montana a question for my own information. I have heard a great deal about the proposed railroad legislation. I understand that it originated in a committee appointed by the President of the United States consisting of three railroad executives and three representing railroad labor; that they considered the matter with particular reference to the bad situation in which the railroads find themselves, and with the purpose in view of helping them out of that situation.

I have read the report of the committee and the minority views, and I have listened to a great deal of debate, but I believe I can safely say, and I think Senators present will corroborate me, that so far no one has shown wherein this legislation will aid the railroads, and before we reach the end of the discussion I should like to have the distinguished Senator from Montana, who has worked so diligently in this matter and has shown such great zeal in it, and for whom I have a great regard, tell the Senate, and, if other Senators already know, then to tell me, because I do not know, wherein this proposed legislation will help the railroads. I wish to know; and I am not making the request critically. I desire to support the bill, but I do not want to do a vain thing. I do not wish to take in all the water traffic business unless it is going to help the railroads, and help them very materially.

Will the Senator kindly tell me wherein the proposed legislation will help the railroads?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I do not intend, at this late hour, to repeat what I have already said. I appreciate that the Senator would like to have me go into a long discussion of what the proposed legislation will do for the railroads and what it will not do. But the Senator is not going to get me to enter into that kind of a discussion this evening, and if he himself cannot find out wherein the measure, if passed, will help the railroads, and what it will do, I am sorry; but I cannot furnish any further information than appears in the report, in addition to what I said in my opening statement on the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished friend for the flood of light he has thrown upon my question.

Now let me say, very considerately, that I have studied the proposed legislation with a great deal of interest. I spent all of last Saturday in my room studying it, and I do not see how it will help the railroads. I believe I will make a little argument about that. I am not saying that I will not vote for the measure.

What does the bill propose? It brings forward a great deal of the old railroad law. As Mr. Eastman says, it is a modification of existing law.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Perhaps the Senator will not agree with me, but so far as I can see now, the railroads of the country are headed into bankruptcy and receivership. I wonder whether the Senator will not agree with me in that statement. The largest and best railroads of the country are in the "red." It may not be the philosophy of the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, but I am wondering whether the final solution is not Government ownership.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I hope that is not the final solution, and I do not think it is. I do not think that solves anything. I do not think that would make the slightest contribution toward the solution of the problem.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I should like to call attention to pages 59 and 60 of the report of the President's committee, where the following appears:

Employment: The number of railway employees reached its peak in the year 1920, when it aggregated 2,022,000. The number had declined to 1,487,000 in 1930, averaged 1,063,000 per year from 1931 to 1937, and is estimated at 940,000 in 1938. This is the lowest level reached since 1897. These figures are shown in table 16.

The aggregate pay roll of railway employees also reached its peak in 1920, when it amounted to $3,681,000,000. It had declined to $2,551,000,000 in 1930, averaged $1,715,000,000 per year from 1931 to 1937, and is estimated at $1,737,000,000 in 1938.

Receiverships and trusteeships: The financial statistics presented with respect to railway operations clearly indicate the condition of with respect to railway operations clearly indicate the condition of the railway industry, today and in recent years. This situation is the railway industry, today and in recent years. This situation is further emphasized by the fact that more than 75,000 miles of railway line, or 32 percent of all railway mileage, are now in the hands of receivers or trustees, unable to meet their obligations and undergoing a reorganization of their several capital structures. This is the largest proportion of rail mileage in bankruptcy ever recorded in history Companies in the hands of receivers or trustees represent 27 percent of total railway investment, 29.9 percent of total railway capitalization, earned 22 percent of total railway revenues in 1937 and employed 23.9 percent of the total number of railway employees. These statistics are drawn from table 17.

Railway capital: Table 18 shows the total amount of railway bonds and stocks outstanding in the hands of the public during the period from 1921 to 1937. These statistics represent the total the period from 1921 to 1937. These statistics represent the total amounts outstanding, less amount held by the railway companies themselves. The table applies to all steam railways.

As of December 31, 1937, the total amount of such net railway capital outstanding was $18,319,003,000. As of that same date, the Interstate Commerce Commission found the value of the transportation property of all steam railways as $20,262,000,000.

The next table, table 19, shows interest and cash dividends of the transportation of clear of the transportation of railways of class I for the years 1921 to 1937. Beginning with 1929, the table also shows the amounts of interest actually paid each year, contrasted with the amounts accrued. In each of the years 1935 to 1937, more than $100,000,000 of accrued interest was not paid, because the carriers involved failed to earn a sufficient net to meet those charges.

During the first 10 months of 1938 railway dividends were less than during the corresponding period of 1937 by 50 percent.

The Senator would agree, would he not, that the roads are in bankruptcy, or are moving into bankruptcy rapidly? And is there any way out save through Government ownership?

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, yes, Mr. President. There is no reason for anyone being that pessimistic. I think I know what the trouble with the railroads is. Probably that is a brave statement to make, and it may seem to be presumptuous. The trouble with the railroads is precisely the same as the trouble with the rest of the country, and they are no worse off than is the rest of the country. That is a generality, but it can be proved by statistics.

The industrial output of this country is about 19 percent below normal. The carloadings of the railroads are about 24 percent below normal. Get the carloadings up just 24 percent and bring them back to normal, and the railroads will be making money.

The trouble with the railroads is precisely the same as the trouble with the country. As the country comes out of the depression the railroads will come out, and they will never come out with all the legislation in the world unless the country comes out.

I think there is a way for the country to come out, and I have said that so often that I am rather averse to repeating it, but I think the matter is of some seriousness and well worth discussing.

There is a way for this country to come out, but it is not the way we are now going. We are not going to come out by borrowing and spending money. I have said that very often. We have been trying it now since 1933. Our industrial average output is away below normal and tending downward. The number of the unemployed is estimated at from 10,000,000 to 11,000,000. The national debt continues to grow, and the annual interest charge continues to grow, and I am sorry to say that it appears that the revenue of the country promises to go down rather than up. I think we have about demonstrated that we are not going to get anywhere with the borrowing and spending theory, high authority to the contrary notwithstanding. When we have tried it $20,000,000,000 worth and got nowhere, I think we might take the hint.

But Mr. President, there is no reason to be pessimistic. This country will come back when the Federal Government, and principally the Congress, pursues a policy which will encourage the investment of the savings of the people in enterprise. That is the old way, that is the proved way, and that is the only way. We are not doing that. Practically every man in America with money to invest is afraid to invest it. I am one of them. Why are they afraid? I can tell the Senate why they are afraid. Some new thing pops up every day. One cannot invest his money in an unstable situation. I cannot be expected to take my savings and invest them under uncertainties.

Mr. President, I will be very frank. When a Justice of the Supreme Court writes a dissenting opinion declaring that the due-process clause in the fifth and fourteenth amendments should not apply to corporations he gives a shock to the faith of the American people in their country, in their processes, and in the sources of stability which tends toward destruction. Do Senators realize what such a declaration means? Suppose that should be the prevailing rule of the Court instead of merely the dissenting opinion. Then the whole corporate structure of the country would be abandoned because the moment a man put his property, his money, in a corporation he would thereby be deprived of the protection of the due-process clause, and his investment could be seized by the Government.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. How did we get along without the fourteenth amendment?

Mr. BAILEY. We had the fifth.

Mr. CONNALLY. But we still have the fifth amendment. Mr. BAILEY. Yes; but by comparative reasoning and under the doctrine of the Supreme Court if the application of the due-process clause in the fourteenth amendment is taken away the due-process clause in the fifth amendment will go with it. They both have the same meaning.

That is not all. We find that a man like Mr. Amlie is nominated for high office such as that of member of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I think Mr. Amlie is a man of respectable parts. I would not reflect upon his character. I would not reflect upon his intelligence. My understanding is that he is a rather studious man. I know nothing that would lead me to impute anything wrong about his character. But he introduced in the other House an amendment to the Constitution which would deprive every corporation and every investment in America of the defenses of the Bill of Rights. He would have enabled the Federal Government to seize property throughout the country, and take it without due process of law.

My point is that when such a man is nominated for a great position it shocks the confidence—oh, not of the rich bankers in New York, it shocks their confidence, of course, but if it were merely that it would not be so significant. It shocks the confidence of the humblest man in America in the stability of his Government and in the rights of his property.

Mr. President, I am not pessimistic. The American people are not going to stand for that sort of thing, and I do not care what political party puts it forth. If the Republicans stand for that they are in for a beating, and if the Progressives stand for that they are in for a beating, and if the Democrats stand for that they are in for a beating.

The instincts of the American people are sound. When you lose your faith in everything else, preserve your faith in the instincts of the American people. Their hearts are sound. They will go to the brink of the precipice and then they will turn back.

Mr. President, I am not pessimistic. I expect to see a great change, and that change will come in the complexion of things in America, when the Congress and the Government begin to pursue a policy tending to create faith in the power and the will of the Government to protect the property of the people and their savings. Then we shall see a great boom in the world, a great boom in our country, and the railroads will come out all right as will everything else. All that is needed is 25 percent more carloadings and the railroads will be prosperous. Their gross income at one time was $6,000,000,000. Their gross income now is about $4,250,-000,000. Lift the carloadings to 750,000 a week and the railroads will be out of the red and make a profit.

Mr. President, I know there are those throughout the country and here in the Senate who are inclined to take a pessimistic view of things, and I do not blame them in view of certain events, some of which I have mentioned. But I wish again to counsel the American people and the Congress not to despair, not to give way to pessimism.

Last evening I went home and announced that the President had sent down to the Congress the name of a gentleman appointed to be a judge here in the district court of the United States. It happened that he was a North Carolinian, born in Smithfield, N. C. I was very glad to hear of it. He is a fine man. When I mentioned the matter someone in the family circle remarked that there was a tradition about his grandfather in connection with the Charleston earthquake in 1886. The earthquake occurred on an August night. It was August 31, 1886. This old gentleman, whose name was Fuller, had said his prayers and was going off to sleep as the house began to shake. It was a very hot night, and he was not as fully dressed as he would have been in the winter time, but without any ceremony he bolted out on the street. Everyone else in the town, men and women, did likewise. One of his friends caught hold of him and said, "Look here, Mr. Fuller, you ought not to be out here with practically nothing on you. You ought to go home and dress. Look at the ladies round about." "Oh," he said, "what's the use of dressing? We are all going to be in hell in 10 minutes, anyhow."

When the President the other day sent down his question to the committee of which the Senator from Wyoming is chairman, asking why the American people are not investing their savings in enterprise, I thought there was an answer to it, and that was that there are too many people in America who think the whole thing is going to pot in 10 minutes. But it is not. Our country is going on. We will get rid of these wild ideas. We will restore our faith in the Congress and the Constitution, and the courts, and the Government. We will find our way. After a while we will begin to pour out the millions of dollars of savings. There is more money in the banks today than there ever was before. The excess reserves are the greatest in the history of the country—$4,000,000,000.

That credit will be tapped the moment faith in the Government, faith in the national policy, faith in our fellow men is restored. The railroads will then be all right. The industries will then be all right.

I saw a little statement yesterday in the newspapers giving a financial comparison, and the most significant thing in that statement was that the bank circulation in 90 cities of America was at the rate of $96,000,000,000, as compared with $90,000,000,000 in 1933.

Now, no matter what progress we make we are not making any real progress until we increase the bank circulation. That is not money in circulation. That is money circulating. That is the difference, and that is the test.

Let me give the Senate a figure. In 1929 the bank circulation of money, that is the debits of individual accounts, amounted to more than $1,000,000,000,000. What is it now? It is at the rate of only $400,000,000,000 a year. That is four-tenths of what it was. There is the test of the financial condition of our country. The people are not spending their money and therefore money is not circulating. We were putting $18,000,000,000 of new money per year into enterprises throughout the period of the twenties. We are not putting $4,000,000,000 into new enterprises now. When we bring about such conditions that the people will be putting $18,000,000,000 into enterprises the railroads will be all right. Then we will not have any talk of Government ownership.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Could the situation to which the Senator refers be called a sit-down strike of capital?

Mr. BAILEY. Oh my, I am so glad my friend asked that question. I have heard that before. Capital is not on a sit-down strike. Capital is frightened to death. The difference between a rabbit squatting and a rabbit running is very great. If the Senator has hunted rabbits, he should know why rabbits squat. I can tell the Senator why a rabbit squats. He does not squat because he is frightened. He squats because he does not know what to do. If you come up on him very suddenly and have your gun and your dog, he has no defense, and he is not fast, either. He has to run in a crooked fashion to get away at all. He runs first this way and then that way. Why does he squat? He squats because he is in the midst of circumstances under which he does not know what to do, and I wish to say that the wisest thing a man ever did was to do nothing when he did not know what to do. That is the condition of capital. That is the condition of business.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. I should like to know whether or not it is the opinion of the Senator that there have been instances which indicated that the principle of squatter sovereignty should apply?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; there are instances of squatter sovereignty, but the principle does not apply to sit-down strikes, notwithstanding two dissenting opinions in the Supreme Court of the United States. So much for that. I should like to make that point perfectly clear. I must not be charged with being on strike, because I do not put out my money under uncertain conditions. I may be charged with being a fool if I do not put it out the moment I see that I can make a good profit.

I will guarantee that the American people will put out their money under proper conditions. The trouble now is that it is said that if we put it out, it will be taken from us. Such legislation has been proposed. I do not mean to reflect on the Senator who introduced it, or on the committee which approved it. Legislation has been introduced which actually proposes to impose the compulsory purchase of 1 percent Government bonds on persons having as much as $10,000. If the bond were a 1-percent bond it would be worth about 60 cents on the dollar, or perhaps 70 cents. The Government would take my dollar and give me back 70 cents. I would not call that a tax. I would call it plain confiscation.

The Congress has not passed the proposed legislation. I say, however, that so long as that sort of thing is seriously proposed in America, we may trust every man with good common sense to keep his money in his pocket; and I guarantee that the moment we cease that sort of thing the people of the country who have saved money and are saving money will go forward in business enterprises at the rate of $18,-000,000,000 of new money a year, and we shall forget all about the depression. We shall obtain enough revenue to pay off the deficit. If we do not do that, we shall be lost.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. As I understand the Senator from North Carolina, he does not believe that there is a sit-down strike on the part of capital, as suggested by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. BAILEY. Not only do I not believe it, but I know it is not so.

Mr. MINTON. Rather, the Senator from North Carolina believes that business has not the confidence to invest its money because there is no profit in sight?

Mr. BAILEY. Not only that, but the people do not know when some law will be passed telling them that they must buy 1-percent bonds. That is not all. If they put their money in corporate bonds, they do not know when Congress may pass a law depriving them of the protection of the due-process clause of the Constitution. They do not know when someone like Mr. Amlie may obtain the adoption of a constitutional amendment which will enable the Congress to confiscate their property.

Those are elements of uncertainty. I am not protesting against them. When they come up, I shall protest. I am saying that that sort of thing is destroying the faith of the American people in the will and the power of their Government to protect their savings.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield. Mr. MINTON. I understood the Senator to say that the difficulty was that capital felt there was no profit in sight. Mr. BAILEY. No.

Mr. MINTON. I understood him-

Mr. BAILEY. I used the analogy of the rabbit squatting. Mr. MINTON. The rabbit would not squat if he saw something to make him get off his haunches.

Mr. BAILEY. The rabbit squats until he finally decides he must do something.

Mr. MINTON. I understand the Senator to say that if the businessman could see some reason to induce him to invest his money at a profit, he would do so.

Mr. BAILEY. He wants something more than a profit. Mr. MINTON. Is that one of the things that would bring

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, yes; a profit and the assurance that he will have a reasonable opportunity to keep his money and hand it down to his children.

Mr. MINTON. I agree with the Senator in that respect. However, I do not agree with him as to the amount the businessman ought to be permitted to keep.

I wish to direct the Senator's attention to a recent article by Mr. Vanderpoel, the financial editor of the Chicago American. Using as a basis for his article the bulletin of the National City Bank of New York, he pointed out that in 1926, 1927, 1928, and 1929 the industries and corporations of the country generally had an over-all profit of 6.5 percent; but in 1936, 1937, and 1938 they had an over-all profit of 8.3 percent. So it seems that in these times business is enjoying more profits on its investment than it was receiving back in the heyday of prosperity, according to Mr. Vanderpoel, who bases his deductions on the bulletin issued by the National City Bank.

Mr. BAILEY. I think the Senator is very badly misinformed. He is telling us that the profits in 1926, 1927, 1928, and 1929 were less than they were in 1938. I have the data on that subject and will give them to the Senator.

Mr. MINTON. I am not misled by the fact that Mr. Vanderpoel, financial editor of the Chicago American, made that statement in his article and that he said he obtained it from the National City Bank's bulletin. He may be entirely mistaken; but that is what his article said, and he gave his authority for the statement. According to a recent statement in the press the profit of the greatest corporation in the United States for the first quarter of this year was 600 times what it was last year; and its profit in 1936 was 1,624 times what it was in 1932. Six of the great tobacco companies. some of which have their fine factories in the Senator's State, had a profit of $200,000,000 during approximately the same period. Montgomery & Ward had a 100-percent increase over last year and enjoyed the best quarter they have ever enjoyed.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the Senator; but I think it is rather vain to undertake to convince the Senate or anybody else that corporations are making more money now than they were in 1929. I will give the Senator the data and have them printed in the RECORD. I happen not to have them with me, but I have them.

I happen to know something about the tobacco companies. The principal tobacco company located wholly within the State of North Carolinia is the R. J. Reynolds Co., which manufactures Camel cigarettes and many other tobacco products. They formerly made about $37,000,000 a year. Last year they made $23,000,000. I happen to be familiar with the figures. Their dividend used to be $3. It is now about $2.40. I do not know what the American Tobacco Co. is making. However, I am satisfied that all the tobacco companies put together are not making $200,000,000.

If the Senator wishes to know who is making money out of the tobacco business, it is Uncle Sam. He receives 6 cents on every package of cigarettes, and the manufacturers receive four-tenths of a cent on every package of cigarettes. I am a little interested in the idea that it can now be demonstrated that the corporations of America made more money in 1937 and 1938 than they made in 1928 and 1929.

I thank the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] for informing me in an aside that we are about ready to adjourn. I am ready.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Utah [Mr. King] asked me when we were going to adjourn. I said around 5 o'clock if the Senator from North Carolina should have finished. I do not want to take the Senator off his feet.

Mr. BAILEY. I have almost concluded. I meant to take another tack. My friend [Mr. MINTON] challenged me by way of an interesting question, and I undertook to answer it. I am very glad to have had the opportunity.

When the pending bill was first brought up we gave notice that a motion would be made to refer the bill to the Committee on Commerce. I have been awaiting an opportunity all afternoon to make that motion. I think I shall make the motion tomorrow. I believe I can close tonight with just one suggestion.

We are not making the motion by way of any reflection upon the very fine chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee [Mr. Wheeler], my good friend; and we should not think of casting any reflection on the Committee on Interstate Commerce. We are making the motion because the principal effect of the proposed legislation would be to transfer the whole power of the Government in the matter of regulating our waterways from the Maritime Commission to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I refer to the intercoastal and inland waterways, including the Gulf of Mexico and the Great Lakes. It is proposed to transfer the regulatory power over approximately 5,000 miles of waterway transportation.

I do not think I have heard any very good reason for the transfer. The Committee on Commerce has had jurisdiction of the Maritime Commission which has had the regulatory power. It has had only general jurisdiction over the inland waterways, no regulatory power being given over the inland waterways. It is now proposed to transfer that power. We thought it would be proper to refer the matter to the Commerce Committee, which has always had jurisdiction in these matters, and which has some special point of view, and perhaps some information. We did think it would be advisable for the Congress of the United States to be informed by the Maritime Commission, which has had charge of all these matters.

There is nothing before the Interstate Commerce Committee-nothing in its reports, nothing in its hearings-from the Maritime Commission. It happens that today I obtained from Admiral Land, the chairman of the Commission, a very good statement on the whole subject, including some tables. I ask leave of the Senate to have the statement and tables printed overnight. Tomorrow, while I shall not be able to read the statement-it is about 18 pages in length-I think I shall ask either that the clerk read it or that some Senator read it for me. In the meantime, I ask that it be printed in the body of the RECORD as a part of my remarks, together with the tables.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina? The Chair hears none.

The statement and tables are as follows:

STATEMENT BY REAR ADMIRAL EMORY S. LAND, UNITED STATES NAVY, RETIRED, CHAIRMAN OF THE UNITED STATES MARITIME COMMISSION SENATE BILL 2009 AND THE REGULATION OF WATER CARRIERS IN INTER-STATE COMMERCE

This statement deals with the general effect of the present bill This statement deals with the general effect of the present bill (S. 2009) on the regulation of water carriers in interstate commerce. The bill as reported to the Senate is over 200 pages in length and contains over 50 sections. I shall not attempt to discuss the bill, section by section, as such would only serve to obscure the fundamental problems raised by the bill, which are of the utmost importance and can be stated very simply. An analysis of the present regulatory jurisdiction over water carriers of the Maritime Commission and the Interstate Commerce Commission and the principal changes in such jurisdiction which would be made by the present bill is submitted with this statement.

Neither the Maritime Commission nor any Commission representative has at any time been requested to express its views of recommendations on this legislation or to testify in regard thereto. The present bill, from the point of view of regulation of rail transportation, per se, is in the main a codification of existing law as embodied in the Interstate Commerce Act. As to motor carriers, it similarly represents a codification of the Motor Carrier Act (pt. II of the present Interstate Commerce Act). There are certain changes in matters of detail and a claimed improvement in administrative procedure. Speaking generally, there is nothing in this bill which changes the subject matter of Federal regulation of either railroads or motor carriers. However, it proposes to expand and change the method of regulation of water transportation not on the theory that the public using the water carriers demands or would be benefited by such regulation but on the theory that the present economic situation of the railroads requires the form of regulation of water carriers provided for in this bill.

I think that from your own experience in Congress you will arrive at the conclusion that there is no demand for the enactment of the present bill on the part of shippers or the general public. As a matter of fact, farm organizations, shippers, and their trade associations are alarmed at the proposals which it contains changes in matters of detail and a claimed improvement in admin-public. As a matter of fact, farm organizations, shippers, and their trade associations are alarmed at the proposals which it contains and sincerely believe that its passage would be detrimental to their interests. The farmers and other shippers in particular are convinced that the effect of the present bill would be to force water transportation rates to levels closely approximating those of rail rates and higher than necessary to reflect the reasonable cost of water transportation, and that they, the users of water transportation, would be footing the bill for the sole benefit of the railroads.

S. 2009 seeks to achieve comprehensive regulation by the Inter-state Commerce Commission of all common and contract carriers by water in interstate commerce, in three ways:

by water in interstate commerce, in three ways:

(a) By transferring from the Maritime Commission to the Interstate Commerce Commission regulatory functions over domestic water carriers; (the Maritime Commission's jurisdiction over foreign commerce would not be touched).

(b) By subjecting to the Interstate Commerce Commission's jurisdiction certain water carriers not presently regulated; and

(c) By extending regulation to new subject matters.

(a) The Maritime Commission now has extensive jurisdiction over the rates and practices of common and contract carriers by water in the intercoastal trade, and in particular may prescribe the maximum and minimum rates which they may charge. Similar jurisdiction is also exercised over the coastwise common carriers except that as to those operating on the Great Lakes maximum rates only may be prescribed. All such regulatory power is by this bill transferred to the Interstate Commerce Commission. (It is to be noted in this connection that Congress in 1938, by withholding authority to the Maritime Commission to prescribe minimum rates for the Great Lakes common carriers, recognized that this particular form of regulation was not necessary or desirable in the interests of the carriers and the shippers using their facilities. The present bill would authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to pre-of the carriers and the shippers using their facilities. The present bill would authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to prescribe minimum rates for this class of carriers.)

The proponents for vesting regulatory jurisdiction over domestic water carriers in the Interstate Commerce Commission have claimed that this should be done in the interest of coordinated regulation of all forms of transportation. S. 2009, as introduced, included transportation by air as well as other forms of transportation. However, this bill as reported to the Senate excludes transportation. However, this bill as reported to the Senate excludes transportation by air from the regulatory jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. By this exclusion the very foundation of the argument for coordinated regulation is removed.

(b) There are other classes of water carriers whose rates and practices Congress so far has not seen fit to subject to Federal regulation. These are principally the contract carriers in the coastwise trade, and both common and contract carriers plying on the inland waters. Congress, in determining the extent and manner of regulation of water carriers, has taken particular care in the past to give full consideration to essential differences not only in the type of carriers involved but also in the various trades in which they may operate. Under the present bill, while distinctions are made between common carriers and contract carriers, the regulatory provisions affecting each type of carrier are made applicable thereto without sufficient consideration being given to the basic differences arising from the character of the trade in which they may be engaged. One striking example is that S. 2009, by prescribing the same general form of regulation for all contract carriers, destroys the existing right to prescribe maximum rates for the intercoastal Shipping Act, 1933, and after having heard all interested parties, considered it important to grant the power to prescribe maximum rates of contract carriers for the ing any substitute.

The entire subject of what differences in regulatory jurisdiction should be made, particularly with respect to the classes of carriers which would by this bill be regulated for the first time is too complex for inclusion in this statement, but it is a matter which Commission believes should be given careful and detailed consideration.

(c) The present bill not only greatly expands the scope of regulation of the rates and related practices of the water carriers but gives to the Interstate Commerce Commission entirely new juris-diction in other respects. The most important extensions of jurisdiction in other respects. The most important extensions of jurisdiction are the requirement of certificates of public convenience and necessity for the common carriers by water, the requirement of permits for contract carriers by water, and the regulation of the issuance of securities by the Interstate Commerce Commission in the case of both classes of carriers.

I shall first discuss the proposed transfer from the Maritime Commission to the Interstate Commerce Commission of jurisdiction over the classes of carriers presently subject to regulation. Much over the classes of carriers presently subject to regulation. Much of the traffic in the intercoastal trade consists of bulk commodities which the railroads could only carry at rates unremunerative to them, making up the losses on other traffic. But even if all of the intercoastal traffic were carried by rail, it would not add substantially to their total tonnage. A fair comparison of the relative importance of the rail and water movements may be drawn from the fact that the seven principal western railroads carried 208,the fact that the seven principal western railroads carried 208,-000,000 short tons of revenue freight in 1936, whereas both the common and the contract intercoastal carriers by water together carried 7,500,000 short tons. If this water traffic had moved by these western railroads, it would have increased their revenue tonnage by only 3.6 percent, and, by reason of the low rates applicable to most of the commodities, their revenues would be increased by an even smaller percentage. The problems of the intercoastal carriers are mainly problems existing as between themselves, as Congress recognized in passing the Intercoastal Shipping Act, 1933, which gave the Commission a more extended jurisdiction over this class of carriers at that time than in the case of coastwise carriers. The Commission has completed and recently sent to Congress a careful survey of the intercoastal shipping situation. This is a supplement to former Chairman Kennedy's survey of the American merchant marine and copies are available for the members of this committee. There is presently under way a comprehensive investimerchant marine and copies are available for the members of this committee. There is presently under way a comprehensive investigation of the rates and practices in this trade. This investigation is a formal proceeding under the provisions of section 22 of the Shipping Act, 1916. In view of the fact that all of the intercoastal carriers are respondents therein, and a vast number of shippers and other interested parties have expressed their desire to offer testimony at hearings now being held in different parts of the country, the Commission is confident that there will be evolved therefrom a rate structure and a body of practices which will improve conditions in this segment of shipping. prove conditions in this segment of shipping.

As to the coastwise trade, including the Great Lakes, the portion of the cargo carried by these water lines as bulk cargo, such as petroleum, ore, coal, phosphate rock, and sulfur, which is not generally competitive as between the water carriers and the railroads, eraily competitive as between the water carriers and the railroads, is even greater than in the intercoastal trade. In the general cargo which moves in the coastwise trade, there is included a substantial amount of transshipment cargo originating in or destined for foreign ports. The real problems relating to transshipment cargo are, first, to prevent its diversion to direct ocean carriers, most of whom are foreign-owned foreign-flag lines; and, second, to further the development of this type of traffic. The proposed bill which makes transshipment cargo subject to the Interstate Commerce Commission as to that part of the movement which is between ports in the United States would in practice preclude domestic carriers from entering into transshipment are rangements with carriers in foreign commerce, and therefore would force existing traffic to these direct lines and prevent any further development of transshipment business.

In considering whether the interests of these shippers and consumers and the water carriers would be adequately protected if regulatory jurisdiction over them were given to the Interstate Commerce Commission, it should be borne in mind that the railroad carriers may be considered as inherent monopolies in their own carriers may be considered as inherent monopolies in their own field of transportation, while the water carriers have no natural monopoly in respect to water transportation. Every effort of this Commission with respect to the water carriers has been to prevent them from becoming monopolies and to retain the greatest freedom of competition consistent with service to the public. A railroad represents a huge investment in fixed properties and the communities it serves would be, in many instances, greatly injured by its discontinuance. In the case of water carriage the problem is in maintaining the transportation service but not necessarily, however, by the particular carrier then in the trade. Consequently the Commission, in viewing regulatory matters, stresses the adequacy of the service as a whole to the persons employing it and the reasonableness of the as a whole to the persons employing it and the reasonableness of the carriers' rates with relation to the needs of both the shippers and the consumers. The maintenance of a particular carrier in trade, although not neglected, is not given controlling weight. The Commission feels that of necessity the Interstate Commerce Commission would have to use as a measure, in all of its determinations involving the competitive efforts of the railroads and the water carriers to get business, the railroads' struggle for existence.

Coordination is a very desirable objective but it is best obtained Coordination is a very desirable objective but it is best obtained by a proper spirit of cooperation between various agencies of the Government, each of which is expert as to the several problems involved, and not through subordination either in theory or in practice of one phase of the problem to the other. The Martime Commission has always cooperated with closely with the Interstate Commerce Commission as to water rates which in any way affect rail rates. It has recognized the gravity of the railroad problem and, in practice, given most careful consideration to the effect of any regulatory action which it may take upon the railroad rate structure. regulatory action which it may take upon the railroad rate structure. More than this cannot justifiably be asked.

More than this cannot justifiably be asked.

It is to be kept in mind that the primary purpose of the Congress in fostering our domestic commerce is to provide transportation at reasonable costs, to be fair to the carriers in the trade, but not at the expense of the shipping public. It is particularly important that this congressional purpose be adhered to at the present time in the interest of our national economy in order to promote the use of these facilities in the solution of one of our major economic problems—that is, the greater distribution of farm products and other basic commodities. As an illustration, water rates on the principal commodities moving in the intercoastal trade ucts and other basic commodities. As an illustration, water rates on the principal commodities moving in the intercoastal trade range from about 30 percent to 80 percent of rail rates and on the average are about one-half of the comparable rail rates. A table showing the details as to the relative rates paid by shippers in the intercoastal trade for rail and water transportation is submitted in connection with this statement. If these water rates were brought up to levels approximating rail rates, these commodities either would not move at all or would be diverted to the higher cost rail transportation with consequent economic injury to shippers and consumers. The Maritime Commission has exerted every effort to safeguard the interests of the public and has constantly modified and improved its regulatory procedure with that purpose in mind.

One of the reasons advanced for the transfer of jurisdiction over the water carriers from the Maritime Commission to the Interstate Commerce Commission is the supposed existence of some conflict between the regulatory functions of this Commission and its so-called promotional functions. These so-called promotional func-tions are express statutory powers which Congress has given in Commission in order that it may promote domestic and foreign shipping in the interests of our commerce and our national defense.

shipping in the interests of our commerce and our national defense.

As far as domestic water carriers are concerned the only powers which the Maritime Commission has apart from regulation is to assist them in the construction of new vessels, through loans for such construction under title V of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, and to aid in the financing of new construction, reconstruction, or reconditioning through the insurance of ship mortgages under title XI of the act. In exercising these functions the Commission acts in very much the same manner as the Interestate Commerce Commission does in passing upon applications of the reliveder for acts in very much the same manner as the Interstate Commerce Commission does in passing upon applications of the railroads for approval of the issuance of securities. The questions of why financial aid should be granted and the amount thereof are decided by the Interstate Commerce Commission for the railroads as they are decided by the Maritime Commission for the water carriers. The curious point in this argument lies in the fact that under the present bill the Interstate Commerce Commission in the case of water carriers will be passing upon their credit needs both in the case of public and private financing and at the same time regulating them. If the argument has any validity, then in all certainty, the present bill does not meet it.

I shall now discuss those phases of the bill which place under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission carriers not previously subject to regulation with respect to their rates and their operating practices.

The two important classes of carriers are the contract carriers in the coastwise trade and the inland water carriers, both common in the coastwise trade and the inland water carriers, both common and contract carriers. Competition between contract carriers in the coastwise trade and the railroads is negligible. Both those operating on the high seas and those operating on the Great Lakes operating on the high seas and those operating on the Great Lakes compete, if at all, only with the common carriers by water in those trades. It is these common carriers by water who desire, and would possibly be benefited by, the regulation of the contract carriers in these trades to the same extent as the common carriers. Whether it would be desirable to make the regulation of these contract carriers coextensive with that applicable to the common carriers presents many questions which should be given careful consideration. It is sufficient for the purpose of this statement to point out that these problems primarily concern domestic water transportation and have little relationship to the problems of the rall carriers.

The problems involved in the regulation of the inland water carriers must be approached in the light of the historical development of inland waterway transportation. The extensive improvement of our inland waterway system, which the United States Government has financed, indicate the clear purpose of Congress to provide for transportation, particularly of our basic commodities, at rates which reflect economies of water transportation. From the very beginning of our history as a Nation the Federal and State Governments have both recognized the importance of fostering inland water improvements in aid of navigation. Many of our Presidents, including Theodore Roosevelt and every President since then, have urged upon Congress the development of our inland-waterway system; mainly, although not always exclusively, in the interest of providing economic water transportation. Federal aid waterway system; mainly, although not always exclusively, in the interest of providing economic water transportation. Federal aid in the development of inland waterways was greatly accelerated in the 1920's because by that time the public had come to a greater appreciation of the value of water transportation. Barges and steamboats had virtually disappeared from the inland waters and the country had come to depend almost entirely upon the railroads. Commissioner Splawn, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, stated during the hearings on the Lea bill (H. R. 2531) before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House, that the strengthening of the Interstate Commerce Act in 1920 was for the purpose of regulating the railroads on the theory that they the purpose of regulating the railroads on the theory that they had a substantial monopoly of domestic transportation. In addition to more rigid regulation of this monopoly Congress decided to provide for the extensive development of inland rivers and canals and coastwise-water facilities. Waterways were developed and improvements made to meet the requirements of shippers and the general public, and to escape from the virtual monopoly of the railroads. The extent to which this program of developing our inland waterways which began about 1920 is a matter of history, with which this committee is fully familiar.

The Commission is making a survey of this field of water trans-with which this committee is fully familiar.

The Commission is making a survey of this field of water transportation similar to that which has been undertaken by the Commission in other fields, and expects to report to Congress thereon in the near future. Prior to the completion of the survey the Commission is not in a position to state what, if any, regulation of inland water carriers seems necessary or desirable. I feel that in fairness I should state that nothing has so far been developed in the course of making the survey which indicates that regulation to the extent provided under S. 2009 is either necessary or desirable. The present bill provides for the issuance to common carriers by water of certificates of "public convenience and necessity" by the Interstate Commerce Commission before such carriers may engage in water transportation. The certificates would specify the route or trades in which the carrier may operate and would contain such trades in which the carrier may operate and would contain such other restrictions as the Interstate Commerce Commission might other restrictions as the Interstate Commerce Commission might find to be necessary in the public interest. Existing carriers would be entitled to such certificates without proof of public convenience, but their operations may be similarly restricted. These restrictions may be changed from time to time or whenever such changes are necessary to carry out with respect to the operations of the carrier the requirements of this act or those established by the Commission pursuant thereto. The only specific limitation is general in character, namely, that there shall be no restrictions on the carrier to add to its equipment, facilities, or service "within the scope of such certificate," as the development of the business and the demands of the public shall require.

Certificates of public convenience and necessity have their origin demands of the public shall require.

Certificates of public convenience and necessity have their origin and justification in the monopolistic character of railroads. Railroads have been built through the exercise of the power of eminent domain, and frequently with the aid of public grants and loans. They are dedicated to maintain service for the public. They have in some cases been denied the right to abandon it voluntarily or to choose the type of traffic which they undertake to handle. If another competing railroad is once built, both carriers continue as competitors indefinitely, even though the competition may ruin both of them. Under such circumstances, certificates of public convenience and necessity serve a wholly justifiable purpose in preventing the creation of permanent uneconomic competition. On the other hand, domestic water carriers can compete among themselves without the withdrawal of any particular carrier being disastrous to the public and without any necessity for either carrier to continue to operate under circumstances which would ruin both. A water carrier can well cease to carry on a losing venture. If for any reason one of the carriers in the trade ceases operations, the transportation service which it offers can, in most instances, be taken care of through expansion of the facilities of the other carriers or through a new carrifer entering the trade.

riers or through a new carrier entering the trade.

It is one thing to use certificates of public convenience and necessity as a means of regulating and protecting a transportation medium which by reason of legal and economic necessity therefor must be to a considerable extent monopolistic in character. It is another thing to use this device to create a monopoly in the branch of transportation industry where monopoly is presently nonexistent and where the public interest requires that competition, although it should be regulated to prevent abuses should not be limited or discouraged.

The so-called "grandfather clause," namely, the provision whereby existing carriers may obtain these certificates without proof of public convenience and necessity, simply means special privileges to those already in the field, regardless of the present character of the service given by them or their financial ability or willingness to improve the service through the construction of new and faster vessels. The Commission believes that this "freezing" of our downstruction is whelly measured and contrary to the best interest. mestic shipping is wholly unsound and contrary to the best interest of the country.

The provision of the present bill that contract carriers should have permits is likely to prove ineffective, because the business of the contract carriers will in such event largely go to industrial carriers. The large shippers can take care of their own needs by purchasing or bare-boat chartering vessels, thereby becoming private carriers, undertaking no obligations to serve the public.

The smaller shippers have in the past, in a variety of circumstances—as in the case of seasonal movements of goods which the common carriers cannot accommodate, or commodities of the type which vessels maintaining regular schedules find it inconvenient to handle, or ports which do not have enough business for regular services by common carriers—found the use of the contract carriers by water a useful supplement to the more regular transportation facilities. The requirements of permits under the present bill would tend to deprive these smaller shippers of the use of contract carriers by water to take care of their needs.

The great advantage of water transportation to shippers is the carriers by water to take care of their needs.

The great advantage of water transportation to shippers is the flexibility and variety of service it can offer. Certificates of public convenience and permits would destroy this advantage and stifle competition. The same effect of stifling competition is discernible in the provision of the bill, that except with the permission of the Interstate Commerce Commission, no carrier can operate both as a common carrier and a contract carrier. The Commission believes that there may be some objections to this dual form of operation under particular circumstances, but that in general it is desirable to have some flexibility. The small shipper is often benefited by such dual operation because it furnishes an increase in the amount of common-carrier service, in which service his shipments must to have some flexibility. The small shipper is often benefited by such dual operation because it furnishes an increase in the amount of common-carrier service, in which service his shipments must move because they are generally too small to be transported at minimum cargo contract rates. The present bill might tend to destroy this dual type of operation.

As to the control of issuance of securities by domestic water carriers, it must be borne in mind that whenever there is a public issue or distribution of such securities, the Securities and Exchange Commission presently has the the regulatory powers necessary to protect the investing public, and as to Government leans under title V and insurances of preferred mortgages under title XI, the Maritime Commission's jurisdiction thereover is entirely adequate. Shipowners who have applied for financial aid under these provisions (or under any other provisions) have found that the Commission is not countenancing "wildcat financing." Only new vessels for use in domestic trade can be financed under title V, and as to these the Commission requires good security and proof of the operator's ability to operate profitably, as well as of the usefulness of the vessels for the purpose of national defense. Under title XI the Commission carries out the statutory requirements that the shipowner must possess the ability, experience, financial resources, and other qualifications necessary to the adequate operation and maintenance of the property, and that the property or project with respect to which the insurance is granted is economically sound.

Since the matter is covered by applicable statutes, the only reason that could be given for vesting control of the issuance of securities

I wish to speak briefly with respect to the amendment to the present bill which was introduced in the Senate by Senator Clark on behalf of Senator Balley. I think the principle of this amendment that regulation of water carriers should be entrusted to the Maritime Commission is sound for the reasons which I have developed at some length. The proposed amendment, however, does not oped at some length. The proposed amendment, however, does not reach objections to various specific provisions in S. 2009, particularly those involving new subjects of regulation proposed therein. As has been indicated above, it is believed that careful consideration should be given to such subjects before the enactment of legislation further regulating water transportation.

As Commissioner Eastman points out in his testimony on this bill from the point of view of rail regulation, the present act is a codification with many changes in language of the Interstate Commerce Act. The prior statutes have received a rather settled interpretation, both through the decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission and of the courts. Mr. Eastman points out that these changes in language will make the task of interpreting and applying S. 2009 to the railroads extremely difficult. What I wish to point out is that this bill makes an even greater change in language and intent from the portions of the shipping acts, the subject of which is incorporated therein, particularly because language used is made equally applicable to all classes of carriers. Both shipping legislation and railroad legislation have in the past been framed with careful attention being given to the types of carriers to be regulated, and many of the terms and definitions used in regulatory statutes involving shipping have been used with particular application to that industry. In attempting to modify them As Commissioner Eastman points out in his testimony on this by way of omnibus provisions for both the railroad industry and the shipping industry many serious difficulties in interpretation and administration will arise.

administration will arise.

Congress has previously rejected all requests of the railroads or the Interstate Commerce Commission to place the regulation of water carriers under that Federal agency. It has very recently reaffirmed its position that regulation of rail carriers and water carriers should be kept distinct. The Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as it was originally enacted contained a provision authorizing the President after 2 years to transfer the regulatory powers of the Maritime Commission over water carriers to the Interstate Commerce Commission. On the basis of a careful study of this problem by the Commission, the Congress saw fit in the last session to withdraw this authority for transfer by Executive action.

As to the regulation of water carriers presently under the jurisdiction of the Commission, this should, we believe, be left as it is, subject to such changes as the Congress may, upon mature consideration, deem desirable.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, in laying that statement before the Senate I wish to say that I think the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce is entitled to the thanks of the Senate for the great work he has done. I would not let anybody here surpass me in confidence in him or in praise of him. He is my friend. I would not do anything in the world to wound his feelings. I would not make this motion if I thought it would injure his feelings in the slightest degree, and if he should suggest that it did I would withdraw it. We have not any better men in this country than the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER].

The Committee on Interstate Commerce is a great committee, and I do not want its members to think there is any jealousy between the members of the Commerce Committee and the members of the Interstate Commerce Committee. I should hate to have anybody think I would be actuated by any spirit of jealousy in such a matter. When Senators vote on the motion, I ask them please to vote without any respect to me, with a view only to the merits of the matter. It is not in the slightest degree personal.

All I am saying is that, in view of the fact that the Commerce Committee has had this jurisdiction so long, in view of the fact that the Maritime Commission-which operates in cooperation with the Interstate Commerce Commissionhas had this particular work in hand since its inception, and in view of the fact that the Maritime Commission has not been heard, I believe it would be wise and prudent to refer this bill to the Commerce Committee with instructions to hear the Maritime Commission, and perhaps the Mississippi Valley Association and one or two others, and report back to the Senate within 10 days.

I do not wish to delay the consideration of the legislation. I do not wish to throw obstacles in its way. I do wish some Senator would rise and show me wherein it will help the railroads; and I wish to say to the Senate that I intend, if I consistently can, to vote for the bill. I am not trying to defeat it, but I think it involes graver issues than perhaps we suspect. I think it is the most important legislation presented to the Senate this year. I do not think we should proceed to transfer over to the Interstate Commerce Commission all of that great system of water transportation—the inland waterways, the Gulf, the Lakes, and the intercoastal system through the Panama Canal-without hearing from the Maritime Commission, and without then very seriously considering what we do by so vast a change in the national policy. It is an utterly new thing. I do not think we shall lose anything by giving several days of consideration to it.

PUNISHMENT FOR TRANSPORTING STOLEN ANIMALS IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE-VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 77)

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

I return herewith, without my approval, a bill (S. 90) entitled "An act to provide for the punishment of persons transporting stolen animals in interstate commerce, and for other purposes."

The bill proposes to make it a Federal offense to knowingly transport in interstate or foreign commerce any stolen cattle, hog, sheep, horse, or mule, or the carcass or hide or any part of the carcass or hide of any such stolen animal. The receipt of such stolen property would likewise be made a Federal offense.

I disapproved a similar bill after the adjournment of the first session of the Seventy-fifth Congress.

An interesting and far-reaching problem is raised by this type of legislation.

How far does the Congress want to go in extending the Federal police power?

In recent years, with my hearty approval, the Congress has extended jurisdiction over serious criminal offenses, such as kidnaping and bank holdups, making it possible to apprehend such offenders on the theory that in all probability they would cross State lines.

We have also the National Stolen Property Act, which gives Federal jurisdiction in the case of major thefts, i. e., where the value of the property involved is $5,000 or more.

This bill, however, extends this extension of jurisdiction to bring within its terms numerous offenses of the petty larceny type.

I am compelled, therefore, to ask the question, Why does the Federal Government extend its jurisdiction over any stolen cattle, hog, sheep, horse, mule, or the carcass or hide of any such stolen animal, and, at the same time, leave out all other forms of stolen property of comparatively low value?

Why not by the same theory extend Federal jurisdiction to the theft of all other kinds of personal property—property of a value which makes the theft a misdemeanor rather than a crime?

I am wondering if the Congress realizes that the logic of the situation created by this bill would rather definitely encroach on the police power of the several States.

Furthermore, if this act should go into effect, it would mean an additional appropriation to the Department of Justice of about $200,000 a year—that is, if the act is to be properly enforced.

If this type of legislation is extended to all other forms of personal property, additional large sums would have to be appropriated to the Department of Justice.

I am therefore disapproving this bill with the hope that the Congress will seriously consider the ultimate implications of legislation of this type.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 24, 1939.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I take the liberty of expressing my appreciation of the attitude taken by the President. I think he did the proper thing. If we are not careful, we shall soon have all activities controlled by the Federal Government.

LABOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, MAY 24, 1939

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Holy Spirit, faithful Guide, descend and bless us all with great peace and comfort. Only as the heart is pure, humble, and hopeful can we accept and adjust ourselves tranquilly to the severities and experiences of life. O Lord God, to whom shall we go but unto Thee? Thou hast promised us a covert while the waters are troubled. We bow beneath a heavy cloud. O Christ, embark upon the deep and breast the wave. Give prospect of rescue and life to those whose hearts are torn by anxious waiting. May they listen and hear the upper song. We are thankful for the blessed hopes of the human soul.

Eternal Father, strong to save,
Whose arm hath bound the restless wave,
Who bid'st the mighty ocean deep,
Its own appointed limits keep;
Oh hear us when we cry to Thee
For those in peril upon the sea.

Oh, Trinity of love and power, Our brethren shield in danger's hour; From rock and tempest, fire and foe, Protect them wheresoe'er they go; Thus evermore shall rise to Thee Glad hymns of praise from land and sea.

Again, Father, an honored name is called and there is no answer, a name that can be spoken without apology. Father in Heaven, give Thy comforting presence to the stricken loved one.

Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Baldridge, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to a bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 1096. An act to amend section 8c of the Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act of 1937, as amended, to make its provisions applicable to Pacific Northwest boxed apples.

The message also announced that the Senate had ordered that Mr. Barkley, Mr. Pittman, and Mr. McNary be appointed members on the part of the Senate of the joint committee on arrangements for the welcoming of Their Majesties the King and Queen of Great Britain, on June 9, 1939, in accordance with the provisions of Senate Concurrent Resolution 17, agreed to May 23, 1939.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBER

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House:

The SPEAKER,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.
SIR: The certificate of election in due form of law of Hon. Wirt Courtney, as a Representative-elect to the Seventy-sixth Congress, from the Sixth Congressional District of the State of Tennessee, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Hon. Clarence W. Turner, is on file in this office.

Very truly yours,

South Trimble,

Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Mr. COURTNEY appeared in the Well of the House and took the oath of office.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I was given permission, as shown on page 5989 of the Congressional Record, to extend my remarks and to include therein the address delivered by the President at the American Retail Federation Forum. I am informed by the Clerk that the President's speech was inserted in the Record by a Member of the other body, and for that reason my remarks were returned unprinted.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the REC-ORD at this point and include therein a few short paragraphs that I used as an introduction to the President's address. Radio broadcasters and the New York newspapers quoted from my remarks, and for this reason I would like to have them appear in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

President Roosevelt did well in addressing the American people through the American Retail Federation. This enterprising and honorable group of businessmen are immediately in contact with honorable group of businessmen are immediately in contact with the American consumer and selling.

His very clear statement of a continuity of policy should encourage America. Inheriting a tremendous economic burden, he has borne his obligations in a gallant spirit and not only has he saved the country from destruction but he is well on his way to effecting complete recovery.

There can be no further doubt about his objectives, and the country should feel thankful to the Almighty that he has given it such leadership.

it such leadership.

The President's speech is a most valuable contribution to the literature of the New Deal, and it establishes once again that Franklin D. Roosevelt is the best spokesman of his governmental philosophy.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I feel honored to be permitted to insert his brilliant speech in the Congressional Record.

THE SUBMARINE "SQUALUS"

Mr. JENKS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, for the fifth time in the submarine history of the United States Navy impending disaster threatens. I rise to voice the hope that success will attend the efforts of those engaged in the rescue of the 59 men trapped on the crippled submarine, the U. S. S. Squalus, which lies some 15 miles off the coast of New Hampshire, 240 feet below the surface of the Atlantic Ocean.

Since the last submarine disaster, which occurred in December 1927, considerable progress has been made in rescue equipment which, coupled with the heroic efforts of those who have rushed to the scene, give rise to the hope that "all will be well."

Less than an hour ago the Navy Department informed me that while no direct communication had been established, lines from the rescue ship to the crippled vessel have been connected, and that the first diver had gotten down and received responses from those on the Squalus, which fact must sustain the hope and courage of those near and dear to the men aboard and to the Nation as a whole.

The Squalus, newest of the Navy's submarine fleet, was built at the Portsmouth Navy Yard, and was launched last September 14, on which gala occasion I happened to be present. Today anxiety grips us all over the fate of those aboard the Squalus. May they be saved-may they be spared to carry on.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON FORESTRY

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts for immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 23

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the limit of expenditures under Senate Concurrent Resolution 31, Seventy-fifth Congress (providing for the establishment of a Joint Committee on Forestry), is hereby increased by $7,000, of which one-half shall be payable from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 5, strike out "$15,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$7,000."

The committee amendment was agreed to,

The House concurrent resolution was agreed to, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a discussion between Senator TAFT and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH].

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MICHAEL J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein the text of an address of dedication made by Archbishop Spellman, of New York.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

THE ELLENDER SUGAR-ACREAGE BILL

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I have placed on the Speaker's desk a discharge petition, No. 14, to bring to the floor Senate bill 69, known as the Ellender sugar-acreage bill. and I ask all Members who are interested in the raising of sugar beets to sign this petition to give us a chance to see whether the House wants to pass it. The passage of this bill might take many people off the relief roll.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial appearing in this morning's Washington Post, and also some tables which I have prepared.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

NATIONAL DEBT WEEK

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered. There was no objection.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I understand that this has been designated as National Debt Week by the Republican Party. I want to point out that you cannot consider the national debt in vacuo. The present monetary system provides for bringing money into circulation here in this great country by means of the creation of demand deposits by banks to finance borrowing. If private individuals or private enterprises fail to borrow, Government borrowing is the only method under such a system that we can employ to bring into circulation an adequate volume of the means of exchange. Those who object to increasing the national debt must, therefore, necessarily contemplate one of two things: Either a great deflation, continuous rise in the value of money and fall in the value of goods, and great increase in unemployment and distress; or else constructive reform of our method of bringing our Nation's money in circulation, so that it will be brought into circulation without increase in debt by the Government of the Nation and in such volume as to maintain a stable value in the dollar. Such a measure is the answer to increasing debt and is embodied in several measures now in the Banking and Currency Committee, including my own bill, H. R. 4931.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that today, after the conclusion of the other special orders, I may be permitted to address the House for 25 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Rich]?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I have never been so disappointed in all my life as when I heard the statements made by President Franklin D. Roosevelt in his address to the American Retail Federation National Forum at the Mayflower Hotel on Monday, May 22, when I recall the promise Mr. Roosevelt made at Sioux City September 29, 1932, and I quote:

I shall use this position of high responsibility to discuss up and down the country, at all seasons, at all times, the duty of reducing taxes, of increasing the efficiency of government, of cutting out the underbrush around our governmental structure, of getting the most public service for every dollar paid by taxation. This I pledge you and nothing I have said in the campaign transcends in importance this covenant with the taxpayers of this country.

That statement was made previous to his election as President of this country. I agree with that 100 percent. He evidently had some adviser giving him sound advice or he would not have made that statement. And then I go a little further into his campaign and quote from Franklin D. Roosevelt's speech delivered at Brooklyn, N. Y., on November 4, 1932, and I quote:

The people of America demand a reduction of Federal expenditure. It can be accomplished not only by reducing the expenditures of existing departments, but it can be done by abolishing many useless commissions, bureaus, and functions, and it can be done by consolidating many activities of the Government.

So you can see that the President of the United States knew that a solvent country certainly needed a balanced Budget and he knew that the income must meet the outgo. He also understood thoroughly that we should not be overburdened by bureaus and by excess Government functions.

Now, I give you a statement of the New Deal debt created by the President of the United States in the past 6 years, as well as the financial conditions of the country from 1920 to 1940. It should be a revelation to the sane, sensible people of America to know just what this administration has been doing.

THE NEW DEAL DEET

New Deal spending has been with us so long that it is quite easy to dismiss it with a shrug of the shoulders. But, as everyone who has ever incurred debt knows, it has to be paid. Besides, no amount of additional spending will make the repayment easier.

Printed below is a bird's-eye view of what has happened to Uncle Printed below is a bird's-eye view of what has happened to Uncle Sam's pocketbook over a period of the past 20 years. The tabulation paints first a graphic picture of frugal, hard-headed Uncle Sam moving cautiously, paying his bills and practicing the art of saying "no" to more spending when he knew he didn't have the money. That picture was true for the first 10 or 11 years under Republican Presidents. The succeeding 10 years paint a picture which is the exact opposite—replete with obvious evidence of ruthless spending, evidence of a complete failure to recognize the necessity for balancing outgo with income. In short, those 10 years preless spending, evidence of a complete failure to recognize the necessity for balancing outgo with income. In short, those 10 years present a perfect picture of what Candidate Franklin D. Roosevelt was talking about at Albany, N. Y., in July 1932 when he asked for "courage to stop borrowing to meet continuing deficits." He asked the Nation "to stop the deficits."

Some months later, in Sioux City, Iowa, in the same year, he accused the Republican administration then in power of being "the greatest spending administration in peacetime in all of our bisgreatest spending administration in peacetime in all of our history." And yet even a casual look at the table, made up from the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, reveals the coarse deception practiced on the American public through the President's words and his administration's subsequent wasting of the public funds.

1920, 1925, and 1930 showed a surplus.

Such astronomical figures must, if the national integrity is to survive, become comprehensible to American voters. This, indeed, is real American money actually owned by the taxpayers of this country. This, it must be understood, is not a childish game wherein figures—perhaps small, meaningless curlicues—are tossed about indiscriminately, with the final total being a huge joke.

Do you pay part of your grocery bill each day and add what is left on to the bill of the next pay day and then on that date pay only half of that total? Of course, you don't. No grocer would hold your account very long under those circumstances. Should an administration, then, which pays its bill in this fashion be trusted by the public which furnishes the money that it spends? Of course not. Of course not.

Of course not.

Look again at the table to see how from 1920 to 1930 the national debt was slowly but surely whittled down. Then see it begin to climb, year in and year out, until by 1940 it is expected to nudge the extreme limit permitted by law.

Why, with $45,000,000,000 one could purchase the entire tangible wealth of each and every one of the New England States. This amazing total is enough to buy the entire wealth of New York State, including New York City, with the wealthy State of Michigan thrown in for good measure.

Now, Members of Congress, after reviewing the New Deal since 1933, let me ask you why the President in his speech at the Mayflower on the 22d contained this most foolish of all expressions that I have ever heard made by anyone in a position of responsibility, and I quote from his speech:

Our national debt, after all, is an internal debt, owed not only by the Nation but to the Nation. If our children have to pay interest on it, they will pay that interest to themselves

Only one other fellow I ever knew of made such a statement, that was Congressman Goldsborough in singing his swan song to the Congress a few weeks ago, and then he was elevated by President Roosevelt to the bench. It certainly was a disappointment to the American people to know that a man who had ideas of that kind should be appointed to a judgeship. Suppose Mr. Goldsborough borrowed $100 from Franklin D. Roosevelt. I wonder if Mr. Goldsborough would have to repay that money to Mr. Roosevelt, or if it would in any way embarrass him if he could not or if he did not pay the interest. If Mr. Roosevelt did not receive the interest, would he be financially embarrassed? Or would Mr. Roosevelt be embarrassed if every Member of Congress borrowed $100 from him-and he certainly ought to be able to lend each one of them $100, because he received a great deal of money left in trust to him by his father and he has never had to work for any money, so he does not know how difficult it is to secure a dollar out in the wide, wide world by having a real, honest-to-goodness job that was not political.

Now, if Mr. Roosevelt made the loan to every Member of Congress, and they decided they did not want to pay the interest, would it embarrass Mr. Roosevelt? Why, we are all one same family, we all belong to that class that is running the Federal Government, and if we do not pay it, why I should think that would be all right. Such an argument as this is just about as sensible as the one Mr. Roosevelt says, that our children will not have to worry about the payment of the debts because they will be paying it to themselves. Ridiculous, unbusinesslike, unsound, un-American. How anybody could get such ideas as those expressed is beyond the comprehension of sound thinking American people. Is such philosophy gained because one has had all the money he wanted to spend from his father's inheritance, or is it because he wants to break down the moral fiber of the American people who have made this country what it is—and that is the workers of America, the men who really wanted a job and wanted to earn a livelihood. Or is he taking the philosophy now of the fellow who does not care a d— whether he works or whether he does not?

It is high time America wakes up and puts men of responsibility in high office. Let us hope that that happens at the very earliest possible date. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks at this point in the Record.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. Thorkelson]?

There was no objection.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, the first consideration of all patriotic citizens is the security of the United States and of all the people in the United States, no matter what race or creed. I make this statement because I do not desire to be misunderstood or misquoted. In taking this view, I hold that each and every law-abiding citizen is entitled to the same rights and the same protection guaranteed to all citizens under the Constitution of the United States, and no more. I for one will be the first to stand forth in the protection of such rights, no matter who is threatened.

For those who are engaged in socialistic and communistic activity to label anyone "Nazi" who holds the fundamental principles of the founders of the Republic in reverence, is an injustice. Our Nation more than ever needs men who believe in the fundamental principles laid down by the founders of the Republic, and the expression of such principles should not be a cause for investigation, but, instead, a reason for admiration. It is upon the observance of these principles that we stand or fall.

I am not a victim of split personality, and when I voice apprehension it is not because of personal beliefs or opinions, but is instead based upon our departure from a republican form of government, and its conversion into a democracy or a socialistic state. The best evidence of this is in Federal invasion of States and usurpation of industry and business by Federal-owned competitive corporations.

The fact that I say that our Nation is undermined with subversive activities in the form of socialism and communism is again not only based upon my personal opinion, but also upon previous investigation by the Dies committee; communistic publications which deliberately and boldly come out and acclaim themselves as such, even to the point where they endorse candidates for office. It is also based upon articles in magazines, such as the recent meetings in Mexico City, in Europe, and demonstrations in the United States. These publications have actually expressed fear that communistic activities are rampant in the Army, and not long ago I saw fear expressed that the same activities are invading the Navy. After reading these articles, to have someone say, "Why worry?" sets me thinking of Russia, Spain, and China as they were in the past and as they are now. I picture destruction of life and property, killing of innocent and defenseless men, women, and children, which is so graphically headlined in newspapers, over radio, in pictures, and on the screen. I ask myself, What sinister power is behind this evil which is now overtaking the world? Is it a repetition of the past, because of adherence to such philosophy as this?-

Protocol XIX. In order to destroy the prestige of heroism for political crime, we shall send it for trial in the category of thieving, murder, and every kind of abominable and filthy crime. Public opinion will then confuse in its conception this category of crime with the disgrace attaching to every other and will brand it with the same contempt.

In my mind's eye I lift the curtain and I see the horrors of past wars, from the time of the Pharaohs to the wanton destruction of innocent life today. As these pictures take shape, I shudder for the safety of a civilization we have built for 2,000 years.

I recall persecutions and the wars in Asia and Europe, when Christians were tortured and died for their faith; when Christian principles and rights stood firmly and unflinchingly against gold and might. Principle won then and it will today. This is a factual history, which anyone may learn if he so desires.

It is time for all patriotic citizens to recognize the enemy within our Nation, so that we may set our own house in order before it is too late. Recognition of danger and preparation may save embarrassment on some future day. We have many examples of this. If China had recognized internal deterioration, she might have escaped the destruction now facing her. If China had realized the danger of socialism and communism—a Russian gift—and in the recognition of that set her own house in order, millions of people now dead might have been alive and happy. The great Chinese Empire is now partitioned between Russian and Japan. This happened because no one worried.

If the people in Spain had recognized the danger of socialism and communism under the red flag, a regime which destroyed churches, convents, and cherished sanctuaries, destruction of this property could have been avoided. Spain has paid the greatest price of all in the destruction of many innocent lives because she did not worry.

It is not my intention and I cannot mention all the destruction for which socialism and communism is responsible, and it is not necessary for me to remind you that these subversive activities are here. There are hundreds of publications in the United States which proclaim themselves communistic, and are recognized as such by everyone who can read. So, I say, Why shut our eyes to the greatest danger of all?

Washington recognized not only the dangers of parties but the inherent danger in the philosophies to which they subscribe and he warned us in these words:

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true; and in governments of a monarchial cast patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged.

It is also well for us to bear in mind that Washington said, "Despots arise on the ruins of public liberty." This is clearly evident as we bear in mind the despotic and imperialistic rulers today. Congress helps this conversion of government when it restricts free speech and when it allows capitalistic control of the press by the invisible interest. Evidence of attempted control of free speech may be found in H. R. 5791, in which restrictions are placed upon broadcasting which might ultimately end in complete Government censorship. This is another method of subversive interest to destroy a valuable means of communication, now already to a certain extent restricted. The queer part is that the same interest is using the radio constantly, often on the expense of the taxpayers, to peddle bedside stories for the gullible.

Congress should, in respect to the glory of freedom of speech, throw House bill 5791 in an ash can. It is difficult today to get facts before the people for the invisible government is so well entrenched and is wielding such control of all gold that it locks the door to truth.

To have a clearer understanding of communism, I quote from Wolves in Sheep's Clothing, not because of the book but because of facts stated in the comparison:

Christianity is love; communism is hate. Christianity is morality; communism is depravity. Christianity is loyalty; communism is treachery. Christianity extends mercy; communism is mercile:

Christianity extends mercy; communism is merciless.
Christianity liberates; communism enslaves.
Christianity builds civilization; communism substitutes barbarism.

Christianity is truth; communism is falsehood.

It was for the investigation of this un-American activity—namely, socialism and communism—that Congress appropriated $100,000 to the Dies committee. It was appropriated to get the facts before the people; and in the establishing of such facts not to shield race, creed, or color. The hundred thousand dollars appropriated by Congress, at the expense of the taxpayers of the United States, was not to buy whitewash for the higher-ups and those actually responsible; it was instead to investigate socialism and communism as it exists in the United States. It is for that reason that all evidence should be admitted, no matter who the guilty may be. It does not matter whether the offender is Scandinavian, Englishman, Occidential, or Asiatic. Guilt should not be established upon creed or race, but upon such subversive activities with which such creed or race may be connected. A lead to this may be found in hundreds of communistic publications throughout the country.

If such organizations as these exist-American Civil Liberties Union, American Society for Cultural Relations With Russia, the Progressive Political Action Conference to Elect Roosevelt, or others-investigations should be made of them for the general welfare of the taxpayers who are paying for the Dies investigation. It would also be well to investigate the personnel of the Harmony Club and to ascertain if the memberships' names did not pass over the press wires a

I note in the Evening Star that the gentlemen are accusing each other of smearing, and that is no more than may be expected when interest is lost in the finding of facts. I quote:

Hammering constantly at the motives of an Indiana Republican leader in sending a purveyor of anti-Semitism seeking a 90-minute interview with the Republican National Committee Chairman John D. M. Hamilton, the House Committee on un-American Activities was accused by one of its own members this afternoon of trying to "smear" the Republican Party.

This is not a surprise to me, for I have attended a couple of hearings for a short while and in each instance listened to a cross-examination of witnesses who had no information but which the gentleman on the committee attempted to connect with the Republican Party. As a listener it occurred to me that the examiner did not attempt to establish facts in respect to socialism and communism but instead wasted time to establish contradictory evidence by the witness. This attempted smearing of the Republican Party cannot be helped because the Democratic Party is now a front for the Socialists and openly supported by the Communist Party in the United States in its own publications and also in the daily press. I have already quoted evidence of this a few days ago when the Communist Party said they would support President Roosevelt for the third term. It is therefore only reasonable that the Democrats on the committee are not going to bite the hand that will support them in the next election.

The Dies committee investigating un-American activities, and for which the taxpayers are putting up $100,000, should, in respect to the American people and in honor to their own position in Congress, spare no one from the top to the bottom. The very idea of excluding one particular group because of power in the administration, or because of underground connection with the invisible government, is disgusting and discouraging to those who know the truth.

There is much evidence to be had, and I am sure many patrictic citizens will be glad to testify before the Dies committee if they are not mislabeled in giving such testimony. The Dies committee must first decide which of the European philosophies is not for the better interest of the United States.

That is all, and it is as simple as that, which the committee should know.

It is useless to look for a Nazi or Fascist plot, because both of these governments are socialistic, and if there is any plot it is one of socialism. The next thing for the committee to bear in mind is that socialism has been in existence for many years. As a matter of fact, it has been recognized in the United States for many years. The only philosophy in government that is new is communism, and that brand is found only in Russia. It is communism that has undermined China. It is communism that undermined Spain. The "red" regime was the government in Spain that destroyed churches, convents, and sacred places of worship. It is communism which has upset the Government of France, and it is communism that is going to upset the Government of the United States today, and that is the point for the Dies committee to bear in mind in this investigation.

A patriotic citizen who willingly testifies before the committee should not be treated as though he is an enemy of the United States, for his reason in being connected with an organization opposed to communism is in itself evidence that he is a patriotic citizen, because he recognizes a danger that many of us are fearful of today.

It is useless to cross-examine a witness to establish connections with individuals of no importance and let the ringleaders sit at the top. What the committee should find out is who the ringleaders are and call them in for investigation. Let us destroy the root of the evil instead of chasing around the fringes where nothing can be found. The Dies committee can obtain evidence in regard to communism from their own publications and from other people who are connected with Communist organizations. The papers have already published the fact that communism is within the Army and beginning to infiltrate the Navy. I know from personal contact with members of the C. C. C. camps that communism and radicalism are found in such organizations. The Congress of the United States appropriated $100,000 to investigate un-American activities, and the most dangerous un-American activity is communism. It is here, and the committee knows it.

I have received a letter, and I shall not mention the names because I know many patrons of the organization are innocent and well-meaning members. "The Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League to Champion Human Rights, Inc.," is imprinted on the letterhead, and at the bottom of the page I find, in red letters: "Nazi Germany Is the Enemy of Civilization. Refuse to Trade With the Enemy."

If this organization is investigated, it will be found that some member is at heart a Communist, and it is he, or they, who wields the control in this organization, and this is my reason for this statement:

How can anyone be a champion of human rights, Christian rights, if you please, and at the same time preach hatreds toward any nation? How can the same individual preach boycott and retaliation and call a nation an enemy without having a good reason for it? The committee should call the organization to task and ask why one nation has been selected and set aside as an enemy to the United States, and their

As I said, there must be some reason for forming this organization, and there must be a good cause for setting one nation aside as an enemy to civilization, and certainly an equally good reason for advocating "Refuse to trade with the enemy." Let the Dies committee call the members of this organization up for investigation, and let them give their reason for making the statements that they have made in the letter which I shall be glad to give to the Dies committee. Let these members explain why they call themselves Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League to Champion Human Rights, Inc. I am not interested in any particular people, but I am interested in the opinions they hold, particularly if such opinions are un-American or communistic. As I have said in the first part of my speech, no one would step to the defense of anyone sooner than I. We are, however, faced with a problem, and that problem is communism, and Congress appropriated $100,000 to find out about it. It is up to the Dies committee to set this thing right, and they can do so by examination of this organization first. Let them give the reason for their attitude, and then the Dies committee might get to the bottom of the un-American activities.

Mr. GEHRMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address I have prepared on the St. Lawrence seaway.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GEHRMANN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. Rogers]?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, our colleague from New Hampshire [Mr. Jenks] has spoken very feelingly of the terrible submarine disaster in New England. I know that the Navy is doing everything possible to assist the men who are trapped in that submarine, and I know that the Members of Congress, individually and collectively, have been doing everything possible for them.

One of my constituents, an extremely fine young man, William Joseph Fitzpatrick, of Billerica, Mass., is on that submarine. He is a torpedoman and has had 10 years' service in the United States Navy. I know the Members join with me in anxious sympathy for him and the other members of the crew and their families.

In the year 1927 we had a similar tragic accident, when the submarine S-4 was lost with all of her officers and men. A constituent of mine from Lowell was one of the victims. I have a bill in this House at the present time—H. R. 108—to authorize the payment of $2,500 to the dependents of the officers and men who lost their lives on the S-4. I wish so much it could become law at this session of Congress. The submarine service is an extremely hazardous one, and the men who serve in it should receive higher pension benefits.

May I express the hope that the time will soon come when there will be no necessity for submarines. Until then our submarines should be so constructed that they will be safeguarded from possible disasters of this kind. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record on the subject of legislation needed for Puerto Rico.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico [Mr. IGLESIAS]? There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and to include therein an editorial from the Saturday Evening Post entitled "If We Don't Have War."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Fish]?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Fish]?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, the American people are beginning to wonder why we have no Ambassador in Germany to look after American interests and to use our moral influence for the promotion of peace. The peace of the world hangs in the balance, and yet we have no Ambassador in Berlin, the nerve center of the entire war situation and the most important post in Europe.

President Roosevelt recalled Ambassador Hugh Wilson to consult on German affairs 6 months ago. It would seem that he ought to have been able to ascertain the facts during that time.

Today fear and threats of war cover Europe. The British and French Ambassadors who were withdrawn for about a month after the seizure of Czechoslovakia have returned to Berlin. What right has the State Department to keep paying Ambassador Wilson his salary of $17,500 while he cools his heels in Washington, 4,000 miles from his accredited post? When will this childish and stupid type of diplomacy cease? It is none of our business what form of government exists in Nazi Germany, any more than it is their business what form of government exists in America.

I deplore the lack of statesmanship for peace by a continuation of such an inane and inept policy of having no ambassadorial representation in Germany during these critical times. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, on Monday last I asked and obtained unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and to include a speech by the Honorable Fred K. Nielsen, formerly a Solicitor of the State Department. I have been advised since that the speech exceeds in length that covered by the rules. I have obtained an estimate of the Public Printer in respect to the length and cost of the publication of this speech. I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the Record and include this speech to which I have referred, notwithstanding the estimate of the Public Printer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. Gearhart]?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and to include therein certain tables.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED]?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. KENNEDY]?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the Members of the House an article which appeared in the New York Times this morning. It is refreshing to read an article of this character containing praise of President Roosevelt by one of our big-business executives, especially after listening to the discussion in the House by the Republican Members. This is a story about the employees of the Jacob Ruppert Brewery, which is located in my congressional district. Mr. George Ruppert, the president of the company, states that out of 1,313 male employees of the brewery, 746 are over 40 years of age, 380 are over 50, 112 are over 60, and 21 are over 70 years of age.

This is a fine tribute to many of my constituents and reflects great credit upon this large business organization, which finds it worth while to retain the services of men over forty. I am sure that if we had more companies with this same policy of employment many of our social problems would be solved and great happiness would be brought into the lives of our men of more mature years, who find it increasingly difficult to obtain employment.

The following is the article in full as it appeared in the New York Times today:

MANY RUPPERT MEN OVER 40

Of 1,313 male employees of the Jacob Ruppert Brewery, 746, or 56.8 percent, are over 40 years of age, according to the results of a survey made public yesterday by George E. Ruppert, president of the brewery. Of this number, he said, 380, or 29 percent of the total, are over 50, 112 are over 60, and 21 are over 70. Expressing approval of President Roosevelt's recent appeal to employers in behalf of older men seeking employment, Mr. Ruppert said that "We have found from long experience that whereas the young man may have plenty of strength, vigor, and enthusiasm, nothing can replace the experience, both of business and of life, and the sound judgment of the older man who has learned his job thoroughly and views it from the calm perspective of hard-earned wisdom."

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my own remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, my State is very much interested in the legislation embodied in H. R. 2 and the bills incorporating Dr. Townsend's amendments to that act. I am filing with this body today petitions from over 1,000 of the citizens of my district urging action on this legislation. I have heretofore filed petitions from many thousands of other citizens in my State urging the same course. On February 16 I appeared before the Ways and Means Committee urging action on H. R. 2 and on February 20 I presented to this body House Joint Memorial No. 1 of the Oregon Legislature petitioning Congress to call a constitutional convention to provide for the establishment and operation of the principles of the Townsend recovery program, otherwise known and described as the proposed General Welfare Act of 1937, H. R. 4199.

On March 31 I called the attention of the House to this legislation, comparing it with the social-security program so far as it has to do with old-age annuities, and cited further the resolutions adopted by the various States of the Union calling upon Congress to take action with reference to the Townsend old-age pension plan. This presentation showed that some 14 States of the Union had petitioned the Congress to take action in this matter. Since then four additional States have petitioned the Congress. The 18 States which have filed these petitions are Arizona, California, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Indiana, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Oregon, South Dakota, Washington, Wisconsin, and Wyoming.

On March 31 I again called to the attention of the House this legislation, urging that the Ways and Means Committee take action on this matter in response to the request of millions of American citizens and numerous States of the Union. The Gallup poll, released February 26, 1939, shows that 94 percent of our people favor a reasonable pension. Mr. Roger W. Babson, discussing the social-security law, said that the Townsend plan on some reasonable basis is far safer than the social-security program now being followed.

Mr. John T. Flynn testified before the Ways and Means Committee that the huge reserve being piled up under the social-security plan will never be paid back in any form of the social-security system, and that in 40 years this reserve will amount to some $47,000,000,000. He stated: "I want the Government to stop collecting money it is not going to use for social security."

It is generally conceded that there are in excess of 10,000,-000 American citizens unemployed and that our immediate problem is to create purchasing power in the great mass of our people who are now without the means to purchase the necessities of life which we are able to produce but for which we have no market. The American market is the best in the world, but it is now being absorbed to a considerable extent by foreign importations, to the detriment of American

The Townsend plan is a pay-as-you-go program and will not add to the public debt, which is now reaching the point of saturation and threatening to wreck our financial structure. Instead of borrowing to take care of our unemployed and those on relief, under this plan a reasonable tax will provide the necessary funds to solve this problem and put into the hands of the American people purchasing power. Under it our unemployed will again be absorbed on private pay rolls, our old people who are without means of support will be taken care of, and America will again head back toward prosperity.

As I said in my remarks of March 31, this plan is not merely a pension program, but provides for national recovery and is a philosophy of life founded upon sound American principles. The legions of supporters of the movement in every State of the Union are loyal, patriotic, earnest American citizens

First. To uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States.

ditional American liberties. Third. To oppose fascism, communism, or any other form Second. To stand against the surrender of any of our tra-of dictatorship which may menace the traditional form of American government.

Fourth. To strive for a higher standard of living for the underprivileged classes.

Fifth. To stand as a safeguard of the American tradition against racial, political, or religious intolerance.

Sixth. To foster and promote better citizenship by educating the voters to safeguard their own interests.

The old-age security law has failed to solve this social problem of affording relief to our old people; on the other hand, it has exacted unnecessary, burdensome taxes from workers and employers alike, impeding business and halting recovery. It is limited in its applications to selected groups. It rests upon the fiction that these taxes are to be used for relief payments, whereas the money is immediately spent for Government activities. It stifles industry and robs the wage earner, giving little relief. The Townsend plan, on the other hand, is a pay-as-you-go program. It is universal throughout the United States in its application, covering all citizens 60 years of age or over, otherwise qualified. It is a sound American plan. It will create purchasing power. It will start mills and factories. It will provide pay rolls. It will afford an immense market for American products and will lead America back onto the high road to prosperity. It will provide food, clothing, and shelter for our senior citizens, many of whom are now destitute.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the great interest of our people throughout the United States in the Townsend program, I most respectfully urge upon the members of the Ways and Means Committee that they report out the amended bill so that it may be considered by the House on its merits. Our Constitution protects our American citizens in their right to petition the Congress, and I venture the statement that no legislation pending before this Congress has greater support. or more petitions demanding action. In fulfillment of our duties to our constituents we can do no less than to bring this bill before the House for consideration. If the Ways and Means Committee does not feel justified in reporting out the bill, I urge that all members of the House who are interested in this legislation sign the petition which will be filed to discharge the committee from further consideration of this bill. [Applause.]

COAST GUARD

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries I call up the bill (S. 1369) to authorize necessary facilities for the Coast Guard in the interest of national defense and the performance of its maritime police functions, Union Calendar 196, and ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia calls up the bill S. 1369 and asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TABER. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 1369, with Mr. Johnson of Oklahoma in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, this bill involves three propositions. The first is the construction of three cutters for the Coast Guard to take the place of three existing cutters, one of which is 27 years and the other two of which are either 23 or 24 years old. These cutters will cost approximately $3,000,000 each, making a total for that item of $9,000,000.

The second section in the bill authorizes the construction of a seaplane base at Kodiak, Alaska. This is particularly important at this time for the reason that authority has already been given the Navy to construct an air base. The bill for the Navy authorization and appropriation has recently passed the House, authorizing the construction of an air base at Kodiak, Alaska. It is intended by the Coast Guard that the construction of this base shall proceed with the construction of the naval base at Kodiak, Alaska, and therefore it will work an economy to construct it at this time rather than later.

I have an amendment which I shall offer at the proper place in the bill which directs the Secretary of the Treasury to arrange with the Secretary of the Navy so this work may proceed at the same time.

The third section of the bill provides for the construction of airplanes or seaplanes for use by the Coast Guard at a cost of $2,490,000. I should have said that if the base in Alaska can be constructed along with the base for the Navy the cost is estimated to be $2,733,333, but there will be a saving in the end because quarters are allowed the men of the Coast Guard who would be stationed there, and this fund for quarters will be applied to the use of the air base.

As far as seaplanes are concerned, the bill contemplates the construction of 15 seaplanes. At present the Coast Guard has six seaplanes. There are 7 under construction, and with the 15 which are authorized in this bill there will be a total of 28 airplanes.

Reverting to the necessity for the construction of the Coast Guard cutters, I may say that the Coast Guard cutters that are to be replaced by these three cutters are old, and, what is more important, are slow in speed. May I call the attention of the Committee to an incident which occurred recently at Puerto Rico, where an attempt was made to overhaul the German steamship Frida Horn, which had anchored in that harbor and left without proper papers. After having been there a short while she effectually made her escape because the cutter that was stationed there was slower in speed and could not overhaul her. If we are going to enforce the laws of the United States upon the sea, with the responsibility for which the Coast Guard is peculiarly vested, we must have cutters that are equal in speed to the ships they are to overtake.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

I wonder if some of you gentleman have been out on the coast at various places and watched the Coast Guard cutters following the ships of other nations out to see whether narcotics were thrown overboard or whether there were violations of the law. We must look to the Coast Guard for the protection of our seacoast and the enforcement of the law.

The same thing applies to the airplanes that are required. The work of the Coast Guard has increased materially in the last few years in connection with the enforcement of all laws pertaining to the sea and also the necessity to be in readiness to serve the transoceanic planes that will fly across the oceans. If the Coast Guard had been prepared and ready with sufficient planes at its stations to rush out and effect the rescue, if we had been equipped as we propose to be equipped under this bill, it would not have been necessary for those who went down on the Cavalier to spend as long a time as they did in the water, facing the danger of death not only from drowning but from sharks. Storms interfere very little with the operation of these planes, for, as I recall the testimony, these planes are able to land in the water when there are waves 8 feet high, which is higher than they were at the Cavalier that night.

They effect rescues and they bring ashore not only men who are in danger but when members of the crew of a ship are taken sick and cannot be taken care of the Coast Guard is always there with these airplanes to bring them ashore.

Now, as to the station in Alaska, you gentlemen know the importance of that station, the protection of our halibut fisheries, the protection of our seal fisheries, the enforcement of our laws up there with the wide, long coast to be protected and certain troubles arising within the last few years that can be best avoided by the presence of the Coast Guard to see whether the laws of the United States are being violated.

The Coast Guard airplanes are necessary not only for the sea duty but in the interior of America, when storms come, when floods oversweep our land, these airplanes of the Coast Guard are there to rescue, to aid, to succor, and to bring relief. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in opposition to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill? Mr. TABER. I am, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, this is National Debt Week, and it is but natural that we should have an attempt to raise the national debt on such a glorious occasion. We started in well yesterday. We have 10 or 11 bills today, all of them designed to make a great big dent in the Treasury.

It is stated in the report on this bill with reference to cutters that it authorizes the construction of three new cutters to take the place of some old boats. We have had built at least 20 boats of one kind or another for the Coast Guard in the last 3 or 4 years. We have had built something like a dozen of these large cutters. There are now in commission and in operation 34 of these cutters. In my humble opinion, after listening to the hearings upon this subject before the Appropriations Committee having in charge the appropriations for the Treasury Department, that is a sufficient number.

The limit of cost is not told here, but I would expect that the limit of cost on each of these ships would be something like three or four million dollars. We were not advised about that by the chairman of the committee when he had the floor.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. BLAND. When I had the floor I stated that the three cutters would cost $3,000,000 each.

Mr. TABER. Three million dollars each, which would mean $9,000,000.

Now, if you should happen to have the Treasury Department hearings of this year, you would find on page 439 a statement of the craft that they have available. You would see that the total of ships that are ready for service is very substantial. They have not that tremendous burden of following up smuggling that they did have for 15 years under the prohibition law, and their work for these ships is very largely of a patrol order or rescue work. They are able to place ships of at least 2,000 tons' capacity in each of the stations that they already have. I cannot, in view of the 34 ships that they have available, and their ability to place them around where they can cover the situation completely, see any justification for going ahead and building three more

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. McLEOD. Does the gentleman know how many seaplanes of long cruising radius were provided for in the Treasury bill of this year—was it one or two?

Mr. TABER. As I recall, it was two.

Mr. McLEOD. Is it not a fact that the testimony before the committee was that that was all that was required and desired by the Coast Guard for the coming year?

Mr. TABER. I think there was a cut in the number that was reported out by the committee, but I think that was the number finally in the bill.

Mr. McLEOD. At least they did not ask for more than four long-range planes?

Mr. TABER. They did not. The situation with reference to long-range planes is something like this: The longrange planes are almost never used. The medium-range planes or the short-range planes are used quite considerably, and the real, effective work is all done by the short-range and the medium-range planes.

The great, big planes, that cost something like $750,000, are almost never used, and they have absolutely no military value because they are designed especially for rescue work.

Mr. McLEOD. And it is a fact, is it not, that there was no such number as 15 long-range planes asked for in the annual appropriations?

Mr. TABER. Oh, no; nothing like it at all. All of the stations are now provided with these long-range planes, and the money is appropriated to build them.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Has the gentleman any schedule of the age of the present planes in the service of the Coast Guard?

Mr. TABER. Replacements are authorized without any additional legislation. There would be no need for any legislation of this kind with reference to replacements. The replacements in the Coast Guard depend largely upon the use of the ship. If the ship happens to be smashed up as a result of some of their operations, it may require replacement. Otherwise they should last for 6 or 7 years. They do not become obsolete, the way the Army and the Navy planes do, because the design has changed very little in a long time.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. I have a Coast Guard station in my own city, and I have observed the character of some of the planes in that Coast Guard station, and I am informed that some of those planes are obsolete planes, taken over from the Navy; and being acquainted with the work of the Coast Guard, I say they ought to have the best planes that we can provide for them. It is pitiful in those northern waters to ask these men to go out on the ocean swells and risk their lives in trying to save others with the motor cratesand that is what these planes are that they have at the present time. That is why I have asked the question as to whether we have modern planes in the service of the Coast

Mr. TABER. Perhaps there may be some that are taken over from the Navy, but I would doubt if they have any of that type at the present time. They may have.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. It has been the custom to turn them over back to the Coast Guard.

Mr. TABER. Only years ago-not recently, I think, because there has been a very considerable planes program on the part of the Coast Guard over the last few years.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. I was asking whether the gentleman had any information as to the age of these aircraft in the service of the Coast Guard.

Mr. TABER. The number of aircraft in the service in 1928 was five. I skip a few years now. In 1933 it was 13. At the present time it is 51, and there are 12 under construction, so there are enough under construction that by 1940 the total will make 63.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Is there anything in the RECORD that shows the age of the present planes that are in the service that will be replaced by these new planes?

Mr. TABER. Some of these new planes are for new stations. There is a new station in North Carolina and one in California, and equipment of at least six planes, as I understand it, is provided for for each of those stations. Of course those stations are in course of construction and they are, as I understand it, not yet completed, and they probably are not yet equipped. I assume that particular increase in planes that is expected in the next year, 1940, accounts for the increase from 51 to 63 planes.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. The only part that I am interested in is to see that those older planes are taken out of the service and the men given a chance to save their own lives in the hazardous waters of New England.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. BLAND. The report is that at present the Coast Guard has six, and there are seven under construction of these seaplanes, and four of the old type seaplanes which are now about 12 years old, and which should be out of the service.

Mr. TABER. There was no complaint along that line when they were before the Committee on Appropriations. I understood they had a large number of planes. I understood they had a large number of seaplanes in the service. I suppose these 15-

Mr. CULKIN. Those are seaplanes.

Mr. TABER. Are of the largest size. We did have a complement in the Atlantic City station. I understood there was one in the Massachusetts station of these long-range planes, and there is to be one in the Elizabethtown, N. C., station. There is to be one in Los Angeles, as I remember it.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes. Mr. BLAND. I can give the gentleman what the report is as to the long-range planes: One long-range plane is in Florida and is 6 years old; one in New York, 6 years old; one at Salem, Mass., 6 years old; one at Biloxi, Miss., longrange, 6 years old; New York, long-range, 1 year old; Salem, Mass., 1 year old; Charleston, S. C., one; San Diego, one; Port Angeles, one; Cape May, one; and each of them is 1 year old. That constitutes the long-range planes.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. How many short-range planes have they and how old are they? The complaints I get from the station in my own city of Salem, Mass., are that these planes are nothing more or less than old crates. I know the character of work that these men do away out in the northern Atlantic, in the middle of winter, and we ought to give them the best planes we can.

Mr. BLAND. I thoroughly agree. There are 11 intermediate-type planes designated, and they run from 8 years oldone 8, one 7, and the rest 4 years old. Then there are 20 inshore patrol planes that run from 4 years old to 1 year old each. There are 10 special service planes.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. That is, at any particular station?

Mr. BLAND. Well, the special service planes are located as follows: Two planes 2 years old at El Paso; one 6 years old at New York; one 2 years old at St. Petersburg, Fla.; another 2 years old at St. Petersburg; Charleston, S. C., one 1 year old; Charleston, S. C., one 1 year old; Cape May, one 3 years old; Cape May, one 4 years old; New York, one 4 years old.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Has the gentleman any break-down of the number of planes over the age of 7 years? Mr. BLAND. I will try to answer the gentleman in just a

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. That is important because these men perform the most hazardous work of any branch of the Government, and they ought to be provided with the best planes we can find.

Mr. BLAND. I think there is only one plane that is over 7 years old, and that one is 8 years old. That is an intermediate plane, located at Bristol, Pa.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. That is the oldest plane now in the service?

Mr. BLAND. That is the oldest plane now in the service, and that is the information given me as to type, age, and location by the Coast Guard.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. There have been considerable replacements in the last 2 years, because 2 years ago they had a large number of old planes, some of which they got from the Navy.

Mr. BLAND. This is the latest information I have. Mr. TABER. I think the gentleman will find that there are very few planes that are beyond 6 years of age, because there has been a very large construction program, indicating a large development. When they come to see they have a couple of smaller-sized planes, a couple of the medium-sized planes, and one of the large-sized planes at the major stations, they are pretty well taken care of.

Frankly, I do not regard the item for the station in Alaska as of such major importance that I would want to fight it, but I do feel that the new cutters that are authorized are entirely unjustified. I can see no reason for that at this

I hope that when this bill is read for amendment the House will adopt some amendments that will cut it down and will permit of the saving of money. I am not opposed to reasonable expenditures for the Coast Guard, but I do not like to see an expansion that is not justified by the activities it should perform.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Chairman, under an authorization passed by the Congress in 1916 funds were appropriated last year and also this year for the establishment of two additional Coast Guard air bases, one being at Elizabeth City, N. C., and the other being at San Francisco. The Appropriations Committee, both last year and this year, and the House, by a unanimous vote, were kind enough to completely equip the station in which I am interested in North Carolina, and to fully equip the San Francisco station, with the exception of one plane. Therefore, as far as district lines are concerned, I am in no way affected by this bill.

As I understand, each Coast Guard air base is supposed to have six planes-two small planes, two of intermediate type, and two of the so-called super- or long-range planes. It is absolutely necessary, according to all of the evidence and the testimony that has been given to the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, that there must be two of each of these types. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] has stated that these long-range planes are seldom used. Certainly we hope that situation will continue. We do not want to see them used, but they stand there as messengers of mercy in case of disaster, or otherwise, when these things occur.

We can only point their necessity and need by giving instances of where they were necessary. At this very session of Congress the House permitted a lieutenant commander in the Coast Guard to accept a decoration or medal from a foreign country. I wonder if the Members of the House have ever had occasion to read that thrilling report. A Greek steamer went down while we were here in extra session in November 1937, off perhaps the most dangerous point on the whole Atlantic coast, Diamond Shoals, off of my district. The record showed that the first knowledge anyone had that the ship had foundered was at 8 o'clock on the morning of November 13, 1937. The Coast Guard cutter did not arrive there until 9 o'clock that night. At 8:50 o'clock the next morning the first Navy plane reached there, but on account of the terrible weather and the storms that were then covering that area, that plane, being the intermediate type, could accomplish nothing, and although 35 hours after the boat went down survivors were finally sighted, it was 12 o'clock on the following day before a plane could get down there from Cape May, N. J., to the North Carolina coast. By the use of that plane, one of the superplanes that we are now talking about, and which the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] says are seldom used, they were able to sight all of the survivors, saved 22, found 3 dead bodies, and in the thrilling and gripping report that I have just referred to you will find that those men were struggling there in the water clinging to bits of wreckage for nearly 48 hours, and three of them were consumed by sharks out there in the Gulf Stream.

In a more recent case, when the Cavalier went down, had the station at Cape May, N. J., been fully equipped that disaster would not have turned out as badly as it did.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. WARREN. The station at Cape May, N. J., at that particular time had only one of these superplanes; and, as luck would have it, that plane was in the repair shop at the time. The Coast Guard therefore did not have a plane of that type that they could send to sea.

These planes, Mr. Chairman, are necessary for the purpose of saving human life. Certainly the whole history of the Coast Guard, the first service in our country established by Congress right after we became a nation, has a record of heroism and glory that has been unsurpassed by any service of our country. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDAGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. SANDAGER. If we increase trans-Atlantic flying, does not the gentleman think we ought to go along with it from the standpoint of defense and safety?

Mr. WARREN. I do, of course; and while we are not emphasizing the fact that there is national defense in connection with this authorization, still we know that it is obliged to have that angle, for there has been testimony before the committee that in the case of these superplanes, these longrange cruising planes, they can be almost instantly transformed into planes suitable for national defense. I certainly hope very much that the House in its wisdom will pass this bill as written, because it has been established that the Alaskan base in conjunction with the Navy is necessary; and certainly three cutters ranging in age from 24 to 27 years ought to be replaced with modern ships. This is merely an authorization; whether it will be carried out depends upon how much of it in the future the Appropriations Committee provides funds for. We are not counting the cost this very minute in the terrible disaster off the coast of New Hampshire. We are thinking of human values. We must have the tools to save life. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, this is National Debt Week. A very appropriate editorial appeared in today's edition of the Washington News, and since it is short I shall read it to the membership of the Committee. It is under the caption "National Debt Week."

This is being celebrated as National Debt Week by the Republicans, while in other quarters it is halled as "foreign trade week."

The Republicans seem to have picked the more lively topic: The national debt is a lusty, thriving giant, while foreign trade is pigeon-breasted and swaybacked from malnutrition despite the tender nursing of Secretary Hull.

We're puzzled, however, to find the G. O. P. confining its observance of debt week to speechmaking and the issuance of redrik statistics. Judging from the load cilence of mean learning them.

ink statistics. Judging from the loud silence of many Republicans in the Senate when hundreds of millions were being added to the farm bill, and of Republicans in the House when extra clerks were voted for Congressmen, a logical move this week would have been a Republican demand for appropriation of a million dollars (in borrowed money, of course) to finance the celebration.

It occurs to me we can do something besides make speeches about the national debt. It occurs to me we can do something besides sling red ink statistics over the countryside. It occurs to me that the appropriating branch and the authorizing branch of the Government might very well observe National Debt Week by first making a distinction between that which is essential and that which is desirable, and then commemorate this week by cutting down appropriations on nonessentials. Certainly I am not misled about the fact that this is but an authorization bill, because I have yet to see very many bills that have authorized the construction of equipment and the ultimate appropriation of funds but what were translated into actuality.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. DIRKSEN. I hope the gentleman will excuse me just

This bill calls for the construction of three Coast Guard cutters at $3,000,000 each, which makes a total for this item of $9,000,000. Included also is the establishment, equipment, and maintenance of a Coast Guard air base on the coast of Alaska to cost $2,733,000. The bill also authorizes the construction of 15 additional seaplanes for an over-all cost of $2,490,000. So there is an authorization before this Committee this afternoon for $14,223,000. As I said before, we are confronted now with the question of whether it is an essential or a desirable expenditure. I have not the slightest doubt that this is desirable, any more than I have the slightest notion that millions upon millions of dollars that are authorized here are desirable. I can think of a great many, but the question is, Is it essential? And is it so essential that we have got to spend millions and millions of borrowed money, increase the debt, increase the interest on the debt, and gradually shove into the shoals and impair the ship of fiscal solidarity?

When you authorize this today and this money is appropriated by the Appropriations Committee, make no mistake about it, you are going to authorize the appropriation of $14,223,000 of borrowed money. There is a very hefty deficit here, well over $3,000,000,000 in the Budget of 1940. Go to the document room and get a copy of the Budget and you will find in the President's own figures that the deficit for the fiscal year 1940 is estimated at $3,400,000,000, as I remember the figures. We are adding to it constantly. Here is another authorization to increase it by $14,000,000.

Let us make up our minds whether it is essential, or whether it is just desirable. If it is desirable, all right; let us regard it as such and say that we can defer it until a later date. If it is essential, then the authorization should be passed. In my own humble judgment we have gotten along this far with our present Coast Guard Establishment, they have conducted thrilling rescues as delineated by our good friend from North Carolina, and I am not at all sure that we cannot continue for a little while without reaching out for another $14,223,000 of borrowed money in order to provide 15 seaplanes, 1 air base, 1 coastal base or combination base, and 3 Coast Guard cutters. For this reason I for one am going to observe National Debt Week by voting against this bill.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. The gentlemen have always had a high regard for the members of the committee who work indefatigably on these bills.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes, indeed.

Mr. SIROVICH. The gentleman represents a healthy part of the Republican side of this organization. Does our distinguished colleague feel that he should brush aside the unanimous opinion of 21 members of a committee which has held hearings and heard witnesses on the subject before they reported the bill out unanimously on the ground that these things were essential?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Maybe so. I do not reflect upon the judgment or the discretion of the members of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. I am expressing only my own view; and I am going to conclude these brief observations by saying merely that I am going to follow out the implications of the editorial in the Washington News of today. Instead of making speeches I am going to continue to try to cut down the national debt as I did on yesterday, when I voted to refuse to send the farm bill to conference unless it were earmarked and the conferees instructed.

Today I am going to vote against the $14,233,000 of borrowed money that is authorized in this bill for equipment. which may be desirable but which I suppose we can defer a little while.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky. Mr. MAY. If the gentleman wishes some real information as to what constitutes a public debt, I would suggest he read the editorial in the Washington Herald this morning.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I may say to the gentleman I sat down with the retailers several nights ago and listened to the President of the United States talk about debt and taxes. He said there in a whimsical way that he thought this intelligent Nation would rest its faith in arithmetic. I may say to the members of the committee that I will rest my faith in arithmetic also. The little red schoolhouse of long ago was not very long on teaching the history of ancient civilizations, and it did not teach integral calculus and a lot of fancy rhetoric, but it did teach arithmetic. Everywhere in the country today we have housewives who know how to add up a grocery bill. We have farmers who know how to calculate a balance sheet. We have businessmen who know how to calculate because they must if they are going to stay in business. We have workingmen who can calculate an income tax or property-tax statement. Now, then, I am willing to rest my faith in arithmetic like they are. I may say that neither the President, the Congress of the United States, nor anybody else can escape taking a cap sheet off the national debt and resist a greater deficit unless we start in in our small way and stop this everlasting and eternal expenditure in the Congress. Arithmetic persuades that answer and no other answer. Where else is the remedy? Today, if this authorization carries, we are going to set in motion the forces to add another $14,233,000 to the debt of borrowed funds. That is arithmetic speaking.

Frankly, I am interested in the mysteries of arithmetic whereby you can add $20,000,000,000 to the national debt, then multiply the unemployed in the country to 10,000,000. That is one of the vagaries of arithmetic in which I am going to stake my faith along with the rest of the people of the country. I am interested in the arithmetic of the reciprocaltrade agreements, whereby you can make an agreement with England and the benefits under the most-favored-nation clause of our treaties may be extended to 20 or 30 other nations. I am interested in the arithmetic whereby you buy silver sufficient to effect a ratio of 1 to 3, and what we are going to do with it after we get it. I am interested in the arithmetic whereby you can take the difference between $20.67 and $35 an ounce for gold, subtract it from circulation, and bury it in a hole in the ground down in Kentucky.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] 5 additional minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am interested in the same kind of arithmetic with which we are confronted today, and I will take the President of the United States at his word when he says that an intelligent nation will rest its faith on arithmeticand it is elementary arithmetic at that, by which 2 and 2 equal 4. We are going to have to hold the national debt down, and we are going to have to hold our expenditures down in proportion as we stop authorizing them in the Congress of the United States.

For these reasons I am not going to vote at this time to authorize another $14,233,000 of money that is not now in the Treasury and will not be in the Treasury either this fiscal year or the next fiscal year because of the very substantial and healthy deficit that now confronts the Nation.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that an officer was asked to tell what would be an adequate complement for his station so far as airplanes were concerned and he only mentioned a possible increase of 12, of which less than half would be the large, long-range planes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, my final admonition particularly to my fellow Republicans, is, let us really observe National Debt Week. Let us start today and vote this down and not add another $14,233,000 to the deficit of the Federal Treasury. This will be better than sending red-ink statistics all over the country and making speeches. Let us take a little concrete, tangible action. Arithmetic teaches that only by subtraction and not by addition can the national debt and the continuing deficits be held within bounds.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Culkin].

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, we of the committee have been somewhat amazed at this elequent fusilade against the purposes of this bill.

The bill provides for certain cutters on the Pacific side and for some additional planes for Coast Guard use. There are some things that in the decent administration of government do not permit of so-called or mistaken economy. Economy should go to the surplus and unnecessary functions which the Government in many cases has assumed. These Coast Guard planes and cutters and this station on the Alaska coast form part of one of the genuine functions of government and have to do with the protection of human life. For example, a ship may get in trouble in a prolonged hurricane at sea, two or, perhaps, three thousand miles off the coast, and may have a large passenger list, with men, women, and children on board. It is necessary that planes with a cruising range of 2,500 miles, if need be, be available to go to sea to search out the location of that ship and bring back word to the cutter station. I say to you in all earnestness that the present equipment of the Coast Guard is in fact absolutely indecent in that respect. This is no place to plead for the exercise of a mistaken economy. This is something which involves the decencies of civilization, the protection of human life. You cannot hang an effective economy plea upon such an issue as this, because this proposition involves the very lives of our citizens.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. CULKIN. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. WARREN. Not a week goes by wherever one of these long-range planes is available it does not go hundreds of miles off the coast and take stricken people or ill people or injured people off ships and bring them into hospitals.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman is correct. The duties of the Coast Guard are numerous, and these men are active in a hundred fields involving the protection of life and property at sea and on the shore.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. When Admiral Waesche was before our committee, in giving the list of the occasions when these long-range planes had been used in taking people off boats, he gave just one illustration in a year.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman must know that the elements and the sea do not give advance notice of these casualties at sea. They come on without warning. Man does not make weather. One of the functions of a civilized government is to be prepared for these emergencies and have ready the facilities which may result in the saving of human life. I have a great admiration for the Coast Guard. I know something about it. I know something about Admiral Waesche, its gallant commander. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Warren] very effectively pictured the splendid, long-standing service of the Coast Guard. I will not attempt to add to that eloquent tribute.

I wish to say in conclusion that, based on the hearings to which I listened very attentively, these instruments of civilization, these instruments for the saving of human life.

these ships and planes, are essential to the proper equipment and development of the Coast Guard.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Is it not a pity that the Members of the House and the Senate are not better informed on the real work the Coast Guard is doing?

Mr. CULKIN. I may say to the gentleman that we hear testimony on these propositions by the hour. I am not questioning the character of the knowledge of the distinguished gentleman from New York, but I believe the technical committees of the House who hear these questions discussed—and I could speak on this floor an hour now on this subject—know about them and are most familiar with the technical needs of the situation. The function of the members of the Committee on Appropriations is to decide when the time for appropriation arrives. Let me repeat again that, in the solemn judgment of this committee, this measure is an essential authorization for the efficient performance of the Coast Guard.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Admitting the knowledge of the committee on the technical phases of the Coast Guard work, is it not true that those of us who live in the areas where the Coast Guard stations are located have even better knowledge than the committee itself of the actual work the Coast Guard is doing, because we are so close to it and know what it is doing?

Mr. CULKIN. Yes; you see the picture at close range. If a man is inland—

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. No; I am not inland. I mean on the coast, on the New England waters in the midst of winter.

Mr. CULKIN. I was going to say that if a man is inland his knowledge of the power of the sea and its dangers is not so well developed.

Mr. TABER. If the gentleman will yield further the Appropriations Committee in considering the appropriation for the Coast Guard this last winter held hearings covering 153 pages and went into every detail of the situation. Many of the details, according to the estimates of Admiral Waesche, are entirely different from those presented in this bill. It just makes one think, after having taken his word on appropriations and the things he says he needs, that we should stop and think before we go further.

Mr. CULKIN. May I answer the gentleman this way. Certainly Admiral Waesche could not discuss any of the three items in this bill, the cutters or planes or this station, because he had no authority of law to discuss them. This authorization has not yet been made.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia. Mr. BLAND. Would not the commandant be limited by the appropriations in making his statement to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. CULKIN. I do not believe he really could speak with any authority.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

If the gentleman would like to look at the hearings I have here I refer him to page 580, where the Admiral was asked to state what he thought was desirable. The testimony there tells all about it. That would release him from any obligation not to discuss something that was prohibited by the Budget.

Mr. CULKIN. Sometimes the representatives of these services have a sense of restraint and are unwilling to discuss such matters unless there is an authorization on the books.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. CULKIN. I yield to my colleague on the committee.
Mr. SIROVICH. I have just been told by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Warren] that within the last 2 weeks three American citizens were taken off boats by the Coast Guard and taken to hospitals in order to save their lives. This is just in the one State of North Carolina.

Mr. CULKIN. That is an excellent illustration. May I say to the gentleman that a fire department apparatus or a fire department house, containing various pieces of apparatus, is not in action all the time. Sometimes they do not go into action more than once or twice or three times a month or even once in 3 months, but you have to have them ready. I want the Members of this House to visualize the terror and the suffering of those who go down to the sea in ships and whose lives are, perhaps, well nigh destroyed by its power. The Coast Guard is the agency which comes in time of need and salvages human life and property as well.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Has the Coast Guard, through Admiral Waesche, recommended these facilities that the committee has reported in this bill?

Mr. CULKIN. Yes; of course.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. He has recommended the authorizations contained in this bill?

Mr. CULKIN. We had a full hearing and he testified in detail.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BLAND. Not only have they recommended it, but the Bureau of the Budget has approved it:

Mr. CULKIN. Yes; and may I say for the consolation of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] the President has also recommended it.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Has due consideration been given to the establishment of a Coast Guard station at Kodiak, Alaska, in view of the fact that the Navy also is going to establish one up there?

Mr. CULKIN. I am not going to get into any war-scare talk. I am not so strong on that type of discussion, but I do know that we have got to make some preparation on the Pacific coast for the conditions there, and I will say to the gentleman that this is one phase of it. We have a lot of tonnage in the Pacific. We have a lot of bad weather, particularly between Oregon and Washington, and these are the facilities which will be available to meet such emergencies.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. But I am wondering whether or not there is any occasion for duplicating the facilities, when we are establishing a large naval air base up there. Why can they not be coordinated into one station?

Mr. CULKIN. They are, in a sense, coordinated, but, of course, the Navy is not a Coast Guard facility.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. But, of course, they can be used as such.

Mr. CULKIN. They are utterly distinct, but I understand they are coordinated as far as possible.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. I would like to hear that phase elaborated upon, because it means quite an expense to establish a naval base up there and also a Coast Guard station and there does not seem to me to be very much sense in it.

Mr. CULKIN. I would like to reply to the gentleman by saving-

Mr. TABER. I will reply to the gentleman if the gentleman from New York will permit.

Mr. CULKIN. I will be very glad to have the gentleman do so if he will be detailed about it.

Mr. TABER. I think the reason the naval base does not provide the service that the Coast Guard does is because instead of being an asset for national defense, the Coast Guard planes, all of them, are designed specially and are of special construction so that they are in shape to go out and stand up in serious weather, but they are not of much value from the standpoint of national defense.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. They are good for scouting purposes and, after all, that is a function of the naval air force.

Mr. TABER. They are hardly fast enough for that and it is a different service entirely.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. CULKIN. Let me ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] this question. Does not the gentleman believe that the speed and cruising range of these Coast Guard cutters ought to be advanced somewhat?

Mr. TABER. You have to consider their ability to land on a very rough sea more than you do the ability of the naval planes to do so, and that means a type of construction that does not yield itself as readily to speed as the type of construction that the Navy planes possess. It is so different that it is rather hard for anyone to explain the difference as to speed.

Mr. CULKIN. As the gentleman knows, these planes are competent to land on an 8-foot wave.

Mr. TABER. Some of them are.

Mr. CULKIN. They have got to be able to do that.

Mr. TABER. If they are handled just exactly right.

Mr. CULKIN. As I recall, we had several instances before the committee where they did land on a wave the crest of which was 8 feet high, and they made successful rescues. Under these circumstances, they must be strong planes.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. That happened in my district and in my own city within the last year.

Mr. CULKIN. I heartily recommend this legislation to the gentlemen on both sides of the aisle. It is essentially sound. Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. CULKIN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLAND. A question was raised with reference to the use of these planes for national defense. They will have a cruising range of not less than 2,000 miles, a maximum speed of about 170 miles per hour, and a cruising speed of approximately 115 miles per hour. While they are primarily designed for regular Coast Guard assistance and law enforcement, they will also be so designed that they will incorporate gun mounts and bomb racks on Navy specifications so as to make all planes immediately available for wartime duty as coastal bombers. The Coast Guard automatically becomes a part of the Navy in time of war, and therefore desires to be prepared, not only for its peace functions but for its war functions, and this has Navy approval.

Mr. CULKIN. I endorse that statement, Mr. Chairman. These planes are useful in war or peace.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. Welch].

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the sincere efforts on the part of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] to hold down the cost of government, but I sincerely regret that this effort should apply to the measure now under consideration. The bill authorizes certain necessary facilities for the Coast Guard in the interest of national defense and the performance of maritime police functions. It should be remembered that the Coast Guard is one of the oldest services in the country. At the end of this year it will have been organized 150 years. If we are to maintain an adequate Coast Guard service, the kind of service that is maintained by every maritime country in the world, it should be properly equipped. This bill was carefully considered by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Testimony was adduced; there was no opposition to it. The committee reported the bill to the House unanimously, and I sincerely hope, regardless of the opposition raised, this great service will not be handicapped and that the bill will pass.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, just one more word. The 15 large planes that are being asked for are to have a cruising radius of 2,000 miles. That would take them back to the planes that came out of the factories for the Coast Guard about 3 years ago. That appears on page 579 of the Treasury hearings for 1939. The new planes now coming out have a range of 2,500 miles. That is just an instance to show the kind of set-up that is being presented here.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, the statement is not less than 2,000 miles. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the interest of national defense and to provide adequate facilities for the Coast Guard for the performance of maritime police functions, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized (1) to construct and equip three Coast Guard cutters of approximately 2,000 tons displacement each and designed to have a speed of not less than 20 knots; (2) to establish, equip, and maintain a Coast Guard base and air station on the coast of Alaska in such locality as the Commandant of the Coast Guard may recommend; and (3) to purchase or construct and to equip 15 seaplanes having a cruising range of not less than 2,000 statute

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment proposed by Mr. BLAND: Page 2, line 3, between the word "miles" and the period, insert a colon and add the following: "Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, authorize the construction of the public works and the cretion, authorize the construction of the public works and the provision of the public utilities required for the establishment of said Coast Guard base and air station on the coast of Alaska, to be accomplished by the Secretary of the Navy under a provision to be incorporated in such contract as the Secretary of the Navy may negotiate for naval aviation facilities in Alaska under the authority contained in the act approved April 25, 1939, entitled 'An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with the construction of certain public works, and for other purposes,' and the Secretary of the Navy, upon request and a transfer of the necessary funds, is authorized to accomplish said work accordingly."

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of that amendment is to coordinate with the Navy bill, which has been passed for the construction of the base at Kodiak, and enable the work of the construction of this base and that to go on together and therefore to be unified and in the interest of

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Johnson of Oklahoma, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill S. 1369, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand a division. The House divided; and there were—ayes 85, noes 25.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote upon the ground that there is no quorum present, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. This is an automatic call. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were-yeas 253, nays 93, not voting 84, as follows:

ACQUISITION OF STOCKS OF STRATEGIC AND CRITICAL MATERIALS

Mr. MAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, presented a conference report and statement on the bill (S. 572) to provide for the common defense by acquiring stocks of strategic and critical materials essential to the needs of industry for the manufacture of supplies for the armed forces and the civilian population in time of a national emergency, and to encourage, as far as possible, the further development of strategic and critical materials within the United States for common defense, for printing under the rule.

THE TOWNSEND NATIONAL RECOVERY PLAN,

THE TOWNSEND NATIONAL RECOVERY PLAN,
ENID TOWNSEND CLUB, No. 2,
Enid, Okla, May 6, 1939.

Mr. Congressman: The meanest, and perhaps the most truthful thing ever said about Nero was that he played the fiddle while the flames were destroying Rome.

It would be difficult, I think, to properly appraise the contempt with which succeeding generations of American citizens will regard this administration, and this Congress, which for over 6 long years have held undisputed sway and in that time spent more billions than the entire cost of the Government for the preceding 100 years, and still must admit the greatest number of the unemployed at any time in our history. ployed at any time in our history.

Polysed at any time in our history.

Your utter disregard of the inalienable rights of more than 15,000,000 voters who comprise the membership of more than 10,000 clubs, their number growing daily, and your persistent refusal to accord them a hearing on H. R. 2 and S. 3, which have been regularly introduced, constitutes a record that will undoubtedly confront you in the next congressional campaign.

Representatives are presumed to represent their constituents, and their failure to do so is destructive of the very foundation underlying all real democratic governments.

In justice to the increasing millions of the unemployed; to relieve at least some of the distress of our aging citizens; to prevent future panics; and to obviate the necessity of further increasing the public debt, it would seem that the remedy embodied in the bills referred to, viz: H. R. 2 and S. 3, ought to be brought out of the committee to which they have been referred, be discussed on their merits, and passed; or, at least, be disposed of one way or another by a record vote.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C., May 17, 1939.

Mr. EDMUND FRANTZ,

President, Townsend Club, No. 2, Enid, Okla.

Dear Mr. Frantz: In answer to your letter in regard to the Townsend bill, I feel that I have been unjustly criticized. Last year I joined with other members of the Oklahoma delegation in asking for a hearing on the Townsend bill. This year I have urged the members of the Ways and Means Committee to consider the bill and bring it out. and bring it out.

I think it is grossly unfair to the many paying members of the Townsend Club to pay their dues and be agitated into a frenzy of hope by spellbinders promising $200-a-month pension. The only hope by spellbinders promising $200-a-month pension. The only way this dues-collecting, agitating organization can be stopped is by destroying the illusions that the bill has a chance of passing. It is my belief the best way to destroy this illusion is to bring the bill up on the floor of the House. If and when it does come up, my position is the same. I will be glad to protect our American institutions by casting my vote against it.
Sincerely yours.

TOWNSEND NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS, Chicago, Ill., December 24, 1938.

Hon. Phil. Ferguson,

House Building, Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. Ferguson: Some Members of the last Congress were placed in an embarrassing position by callers who claimed official connection with this organization. During the coming session every authorized representatives of ours will have credentials signed by either Dr. Francis E. Townsend, founder and president; Robert C. Townsend, secretary-treasurer; Otis J. Bouma, who will be in charge of our legislative bureau in Washington; or the writer, L. W. Jeffery, vice president. Every Member of Congress, regardless of his attitude toward our legislation, has been so advised.

A case in point is that of Arthur L. Johnson. At one time he was our legislative representative. He severed his connection with this organization in June 1937.

Since then he has never been, nor is he now, associated in any

Since then he has never been, nor is he now, associated in any way with this organization.

Our organization has and is showing steady growth and it is generally conceded that its influence will be more pronounced in the future. Some Congressmen who received our support in 1936 forgot to keep their pledges. They were replaced either in the primaries or in the general election.

Our bill is entitled to a hearing. This was denied us in the last session. We seek your cooperation to secure a hearing and your help to bring our legislation on the floor of the House for a vote. The Townsend National Weekly, our official publication, will be help to bring our legislation on the floor of the House for a vote. The Townsend National Weekly, our official publication, will be mailed regularly to your office. We suggest, for your own information, you read the issue of January 2, 1939. This contains articles and editorials as well as comment on the growth of the Townsend movement and public sentiment regarding our program. Each succeeding issue will contain much of interest to you.

You will be informed of our Washington headquarters' address at an early date. Any member of our legislative staff will be glad to discuss our program with you at any time.

Very sincerely yours,

EXHIBIT IV

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C., January 6, 1939.

Dr. F. E. Townsend,
450 East Ohio Street, Chicago, III.
DEAR DR. Townsend: I am in receipt of a letter from Mr. L. W.
Jeffery, vice president of your organization. The chief import of the letter is that Arthur L. Johnson is not longer connected with your organization.

I am particularly intrigued by one line in the letter, "Some Congressmen who received our support in 1936 forgot to keep their pledges. They were replaced either in the primaries or in the general election." It gives me a great deal of pleasure to tell you that the only pledge I have ever made to your organization is that I will oppose any legislation that carries in it a 2-percent transaction tax.

I have always felt and so expressed myself to the Congress almost 3 years ago that the promoters of your organization are mainly interested in the dues that are collected from members. Almost 3 years ago I challenged any Member of the House to openly state he would vote for the Townsend plan as set forth in openly state he would vote for the Townsend plan as set forth in your own literature.

This last campaign convinced me more than ever of the lack of sincerity in the political use of your organization. Your organization endorsed candidates, mostly Republicans, whose record in Congress proves them without doubt most reactionary. Not one-half the candidates you have endorsed will give your plan a vote when and if it ever comes to a test. For myself, I shall be more than glad to see this pyramiding tax bill come to a vote so that it can be voted down by such a majority that you and your officials and organizers can no longer collect dues from your misguided supporters whom you have duped into believing Congress will pass the Townsend bill. will pass the Townsend bill. Sincerely yours.

UNITED STATES SUBMARINE "SQUALUS"

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed to make a very brief announce-

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand the gentlewoman is just going to make a statement?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. That is all.

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, earlier in the day I announced that my constituent, William Joseph Fitzpatrick, was one of those who was entrapped in the submarine. I have just been told by the Navy Department that he has been saved, alive and well, and that 31 others have been saved also. I know we all rejoice, and I hope the situation all over the world today will be such that no more submarines will be needed in the future. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WHITE of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered. There was no objection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include a short statement by Mr. Gerside, an economist of the New York Cotton Exchange.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered. There was no objection.

SURVEY VESSELS FOR UNITED STATES COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, by authority of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, I call up the bill (H. R. 138, Union Calendar No. 42), to authorize the construction of certain vessels for the Coast and Geodetic Survey, Department of Commerce, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $1,425,000 to be expended by the Secretary of Commerce for the construction of one main surveying ship of not over 1,500 tons light displacement tonnage and of one auxiliary surveying vessel of not over 125 tons light displacement tonnage, including purchase or construction of complete equipment and outht and including cost of preparation of plans, specifications, and inspection during construction, said ships to be designed and equipped for Coast and Geodetic Survey duties in Alaska.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word just to make a brief statement.

This is for authority for the Coast Guard to construct a very-much-needed vessel for survey purposes in Alaska. There is a very large area there that is not surveyed. There is an earnest demand by the Navy, as well as merchant ships, that that area shall be surveyed in order to avoid wrecks. injuries, and other disasters.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute a similar Senate bill (S. 1842).

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $1,425,000 to be expended by the Secretary of Commerce for the construction of one main surveying ship of not over 1,500 tons light displacement tonnage and of one auxiliary surveying vessel of not over 125 tons light displacement tonnage, including purchase or construction of complete equipment and outfit and including cost of preparation of plans, specifications, and inspection during construction, said ships to be designed and equipped for Coast and Geodetic Survey duties in Alaska.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. Mr. Speaker, once more I find myself in what may be a fortunate or unfortunate position in having to oppose an authorization for an appropriation of $1,425,000 for the construction of one main surveying ship for the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and one auxiliary ship. I stated earlier today when I opposed the last bill that in my humble way I was going to commemorate National Debt Week by seeking to hold down the debt.

I have examined the hearings in which the officials of the Coast and Geodetic Survey testified before the Appropriations Committee, both on the appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1939 and the appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1940. We have added about 16 additional stations for the Coast and Geodetic Survey since 1935. We have given them from $68,000 to $70,000 a year for repair work, and I find that the Chief of the Coast and Geodetic Survey testified no later than this year that the vessels he has at the present time are in fairly good condition. In view of the fact that they are operating 75 vessels, large and small, which includes motor launches and otherwise, it occurs to me that the ships and the equipment available at the present time are adequate. While these two new vessels, costing $1,425,000, may be desirable, I believe a case has not been made out to show that they are essential, and I see no reason why we should reach into the Federal Treasury for a mythical $1,000,000 that is not there but must be borrowed in order to build another ship for the Coast and Geodetic Survey which is not absolutely

So once more I say to you, this being National Debt Week, I hope that we can hold the debt down by $1,425,000; and, therefore, I am opposed to this bill.

Once again I pin my faith in the statement of the President on Tuesday night when he said an intelligent people will rest their faith in arithmetic. Somewhere out of the recesses of memory comes an apostrophe to that science. It runs like this: "Arithmetic, O Stranger, is the first of the sciences." I believe it. Let us then have resort to this first of the sciences and borrow the science of substraction in keeping the debt within bounds. I hope the Committee will defeat this measure.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Speaker, I regret I am not in accord with the committee on this bill.

My opposition to the pending bill is this-but first let me say that I have absolutely no information as to what the President intends to do-from my study of the situation I am absolutely convinced that it would be for the best interests of the country and the best interests of the taxpayers if the Coast and Geodetic Survey were abolished and its functions on water work transferred to the Hydrographic Service of the Navy, and its ground work to the Geological Survey in the Department of the Interior. It is absolutely impossible to abolish or transfer the Hydrographic Service of the Navy, because much of their work is confidential. The President says he will send us some more orders after the first of the year. I think it would be well for this legislation to go over to see just exactly what the President proposes to do, and if he does happen to look with favor on the transfer of the water work of the Coast and Geodetic Survey to the Navy, then the Navy has the necessary ships to do this work. For this reason it is my purpose to vote against this bill. Remember the two agencies do work of the same character.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. COCHRAN. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. The gentleman is not opposed to a survey of this portion of the Alaskan coast that has not been surveyed, is he?

Mr. COCHRAN. My opposition is against authorizing the construction of another vessel for the reasons stated.

Mr. MAGNUSON. What I am getting at is the need for the survey of the Alaskan coast.

Mr. COCHRAN. The Navy certainly can survey the Alaska coast if it gets the water work of the Coast and Geodetic Survey. I would not say it has not already some charts in the area the gentleman mentions. There is duplication of work, because an investigation will disclose that the Navy has made surveys that the Coast and Geodetic Survey have made.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I vield.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman must understand that the Navy cannot make these surveys; that is not part of their job. Mr. COCHRAN. They can if this work is transferred to Mr. CULKIN. The Navy is a combatant force.

Mr. COCHRAN. Surely the gentleman does not doubt the ability of the Hydrographic Service of the Navy to make the surveys. It makes surveys at the present time.

Mr. CULKIN. They do not make this type of survey. Mr. COCHRAN. They can make this type of survey.

Mr. CULKIN. No: they cannot make it.

Mr. COCHRAN. Oh, yes, they can; once the authority is given them. The Navy can do anything it is told to do.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I am not involved in the question of transferring the work of the Coast and Geodetic Survey to the Hydrographic Office of the Navy, or vice versa; that is a matter that the President can attend to, and my good friend can attend to. I am interested, however, in seeing this very necessary work go forward, and the Navy is not doing this kind of work. Evidence was produced before the committee that in an effort to get one of the Navy vessels for this work, the Navy did not have a vessel that was equipped to do this work. The statement Dr. Colbert made before the committee doubtless had reference to the usual work of the Coast and Geodetic Survey; but this work is along the stormy coast of Alaska where there are rocks not shown on existing charts, and not known. These vessels are needed in connection with that work.

The ages of the vessels now operating in that dangerous

Each of these vessels has outlived its usefulness and now they want a new vessel newly equipped, with new accommodations, prepared to carry on this work. After the work begins it will take 8 years to finish. Believe me, I think there are possibly some nations in this world that may know a little more about those coasts up there than we do.

We know that our merchant ships pass very close to these areas that are to be surveyed. This is important and necessary and is supported by the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. STEFAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska. Mr. STEFAN. Does this ship duplicate any of the appropriations we made for the Coast and Geodetic Service in the bill recently passed for the Department of Commerce, the bill we had before us the other day?

Mr. BLAND. This is only an authorization.

Mr. STEFAN. Was there anything in the bill which we passed the other day which provided for some vessels for the Coast and Geodetic Survey?

Mr. BLAND. It might have provided for vessels, but only to carry out authorizations that have already been made.

Doughton

Douglas

Leavy

Zimmerman

This is an authorization that you gentlemen on the Appropriations Committee may go into further.

Mr. STEFAN. Will the gentleman yield further? I want to be helpful to him.

Mr. BLAND. I appreciate that.

Mr. STEFAN. This is a vessel that the Coast and Geodetic Survey has been asking for for a long time in order to survey the uncharted islands in the Aleutian group of islands?

Mr. BLAND. They wanted two. Provision has been made for one already, and this is for the other vessel.

Mr. STEFAN. This is to complete the program in order to chart some of the islands about which we have no informa-

Mr. BLAND. That is the purpose.

Mr. STEFAN. In order to give the Navy information as to what is in that group of islands and to give safe harbor protection to our vessels that want to get in there?

Mr. BLAND. Yes; and for the protection of our fishing interests up there, which run into the millions.

Mr. STEFAN. Will the gentleman in his remarks say something about the proximity of the charted Japanese islands to our islands in the Far East where we want to get our vessels? That is, this particular vessel.

Mr. BLAND. I am advised, and it is my recollection of the testimony, that there are 1,000 miles up there uncharted where we do not know anything about a rock and where one might be struck.

Mr. STEFAN. From 400 to 650 miles to the Japanese islands?

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. STEFAN. What we want to do is to have a vessel go in there and chart the islands in order to get some information, not only for our armed forces but to protect our salmon industry and give them information?

Mr. BLAND. That is correct. Mr. STEFAN. So that all branches of our Government service may have the information in order that they can safely sail around those possessions which belong to the United States?

Mr. BLAND. That is right.

Mr. STEFAN. And secure information that the other branches of our Government are interested in securing at this

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. OLIVER. Is it not a fact this authorization is not for additional strength to the Coast and Goedetic Survey?

Mr. BLAND. That is true.

Mr. OLIVER. It is only for the purpose of replacing a ship which is now 27 years of age?

Mr. BLAND. It puts a ship into the service in those Alaskan waters, supplants an older vessel that is sent to our coastal waters, and that in turn retires an older vessel that has not adequate accommodations for the crew and other people such as a man serving the Government ought to have

Mr. OLIVER. Is it not a fact also that other foreign nations have already made surveys in this particular area?

Mr. BLAND. That is true.

Mr. OLIVER. How can we afford not to do this?

Mr. BLAND. We cannot.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. Just a few years ago I boarded a ship right here in the Potomac River belonging to the Coast and Geodetic Survey and they told me that afternoon that everything in the way of scientific instruments was aboard that ship. Why can we not use that particular ship?

Mr. BLAND. It takes more than one ship. That ship is probably in use at another place. It will take 8 years to complete this job and my plea to this House is to get to

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Dirksen), there were—ayes 85, noes 47.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Obviously there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were-yeas 203, nays 141, not voting 86, as follows:

A House bill (H. R. 138) was laid on the table.

OFFICERS' COMPETENCY CERTIFICATES CONVENTION, 1936

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries I call up the bill (H. R. 3576) to make effective the provisions of the Officers' Competency Certificates Convention, 1936. This bill, commonly known as the competency bill, is No. 260 on the Union Calendar. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That title 52 of the Revised Statutes is amended by inserting after section 4438 thereof a new section designated section 4438a, to read as follows:

"SEC. 4438a. (1) That the Officers' Competency Certificates Convention, 1936 (International Labor Organization Draft Convention

Clearance shall be refused to any vessel which shall have been ordered detained. If the vessel be ordered detained, the master may, within 5 days, appeal to the Secretary of Commerce, who may, after investigation, affirm, set aside, or modify the order of the collector.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, in the closing days of the last Congress there was passed by the Senate by unanimous consent a series of agreements that were known as conventions. They had been agreed to at Geneva and by the International Labor Conference convened at the general conference of the International Labor Organization. One of these treaties provided that certain vessels should come within the operation of that treaty and that no person should be engaged to perform on board any vessel to which the convention applied who was performing the duties of a master or skipper, navigating officer in charge of a watch, chief engineer, or engineer officer in charge of a watch, unless he held a certificate of competency to perform such duties, issued or approved by the public authority of the territory where the vessel was registered. The United States ratified that convention and, among other nations, it came into force with reference to Belgium, Brazil, Denmark, Estonia, New Zealand, and Norway.

The Members of Congress will recall that there was a considerable protest all over the country with respect to the burden that would be placed on fishing vessels. me say right here and now, for the benefit of my friends who are talking about economy, that this bill involves no burden on the Treasury. [Applause.]

We passed a bill in accordance with the language of the convention exempting vessels under 200 tons. We could not exempt vessels of 200 tons or over. Thereafter we went as carefully as we could into the problem of writing the law so that it would be subject to amendment at any time, but it would add no greater, or very few greater, burdens; I might say no greater burdens than today rest upon the vessels. We have our laws with reference to certificates and licenses and that sort of thing. Once we thought we would take up each one of those separately, but there would have been too much rigidity so we have provided that the laws that are now in existence in the United States shall apply as to these vessels and as to officers of fishing vessels that there shall be oral examination, a provision that we are advised imposes no burden on them, and yet complies with the terms of the treaty. This covers yachts, too.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BLAND. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. This does cover yachts?

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. HINSHAW. Recently we passed by unanimous consent a bill that excepted those.

Mr. BLAND. And we expressly renewed that exception in this bill as to vessels under 200 tons, so that this bill would not operate to rescind or repeal what we have already done.

Mr. HINSHAW. That is what I want to know.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Maine. Mr. OLIVER. The fishing industry is clearly exempted from any onerous provisions that might have been in effect if the committee had not taken the action it did?

Mr. BLAND. Undoubtedly that is true.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last

This is to correct a situation in the Panama Canal which has risen very recently by virtue of certain litigation there, and as a result of which our pilots on those boats are being sued, in one case by a foreign country. This is rather affecting their morale. This bill gives the pilots the same exemption that the United States has, which exemption is that suits may be brought against the United States for injuries and damages within the locks and not outside of the locks.

There are other provisions, but all of them are to take care of situations peculiar to the Panama Canal.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

"SEC. 902. (a) Whenever the President shall proclaim that the security of the national defense makes it advisable or during any national emergency declared by proclamation of the President, it shall be lawful for the Commission to requisition or purchase any vessel or other watercraft owned by citizens of the United States, or under construction within the United States, or for any period vessel or other watercraft owned by citizens of the United States, or under construction within the United States, or for any period during such emergency, to requisition or charter the use of any such property. The termination of any emergency so declared shall be announced by a further proclamation by the President. When any such property or the use thereof is so requisitioned, the owner thereof shall be paid just compensation for the property taken or for the use of such property, but in no case shall the value of the property taken or used be deemed enhanced by the causes necessitating the taking or use. If such person does not execute and deliver such charter and accept such rate of hire, the Commission shall pay to such person on account of just compensation a sum equal to 75 percent of such rate of hire as the same may from time to time be due under the terms of the charter so tendered, and such person shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to such 75 percent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation for the use of the property and for the services required in connection with such use. Under special order the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON] is recognized.

THE AMERICAN PLAN

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, for the past few years, and most imminently within the 12 months we have just passed through, the other half of the world has been trembling on the brink of a great war, threatening the end of our twentieth century civilization. The fears engendered by the war mongers of the other side of the globe have enveloped our own country in the dark clouds of doubt and misgivings, perplexing the councils of our statesmen and contributing to the economic uncertainties that keep our people and our industries in a state of unrest and of recurring dread of evils extending to our shores.

Happily peace has been preserved thus far. That the storm has been averted for a time in Europe I firmly believe is due initially to the wise so-called appeasement policy of Prime Minister Chamberlain, which was met at the outset with so much decision. I feel sure that if Mr. Chamberlain had not sought in the manner he did and under the fires of criticism to compel an understanding among the powers of Europe so that differences might be settled around the council table rather than on battlefields soaked with the blood of the manhood of the nations, the war-mad dictators would have set no boundaries to their conquests, and their countries would today be locked in the deadly embrace of contending armies, in the air, on the seas, and in the trenches.

CREDIT DUE TO THE LATE POPE PIUS

The fact that one of the parties to that appeasement agreement signed at Munich proved false to the faith that Chamberlain had in his honor and honesty is no derogation from the high purpose for which that agreement was designed and, in fact, in a large measure-perhaps in a far larger measure than the defaulting signatory visioned-accomplished in the cause of peace. If the peace purchased for the time was paid for by a high price, the aftermath of that Munich agreement proved that there were ways to peace outside of the thundering guns and the "slaughter of the innocents." The horror of the world at the bad faith of the war leaders brought home to its statesmen a realization that the good people of all countries were united in opposition to war as a means of settling international disputes and revealed the fact that "peace and good will" was a doctrine that lay deep in the heart of humanity. For the will to have peace let us give due credit to the late Pope Pius XI, to his illustrious successor who has sounded the same keynote, and to the leaders of the churches of every denomination in America and the world over.

It is saddening to Americans that the Czech Republic has disappeared from the map of Europe. Yet thoughtful Americans and wise American statesmen know that but for the loss of nationality suffered by that nation, hundreds of thousands of young men alive today might be rotting in graves in a war-torn area. The Czech Nation, it is true, was compelled to make the sacrifice, but it may yet come to realize the glory of that sacrifice in the esteem of the nations that its bowing to the yoke saved from the slaughter. Czechoslovakia will not be forgotten.

DRIFT TO WAR APPEARS PERMANENTLY HALTED

There have been times when I felt great concern as to the wisdom of our own statesmanship in the field of international politics—when I felt that we were playing too near the mouth of the volcano, what with dangerous denouncements on one side and partisan criticism on the other. But now, as the dark clouds seem to be lifting and the drifts toward war seem to give promises of a permanent halt, with the sunshine of permanent peace policies breaking through, I seem to see in retrospect that our statesmanship has been both steady and sagacious and stamped with the true American brand.

No matter how political bias and partisan or personal feeling may at times control our judgments, I feel that at this time we should all unite to give unstinted credit to President Roosevelt for his latest communication to the powers of Europe in the interest of peace and good will among the nations. It was no chimerical adventure. His appeal was like the words of wisdom spoken of in the Scriptures, "A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver," ringing with the hopes upon which our own Nation was founded and based upon the most salutary principles of our economic civilization.

I am sure that all that has been said on the floor of the House on this question has reflected the sincere views of the Members, many of whom have spoken on the subject.

CARDINAL AMERICAN PRINCIPLE OF PEACE

The American plan has existed only because men and women of all political faiths have supported it. Its cardinal principle is peace, as evidenced by the willingness of Lincoln to compromise on certain issues if only the Union could be saved. And likewise the great commander, Grant, who said, "Let us have peace," meant peace for all time.

Peace for all time and everywhere is in the heart of every

The history of the past has demonstrated that there was never a war that settled anything. After thousands of years of ever-recurring wars and the brief triumphs of the conquerors, the basic thought of the world today is grounded upon the right of humanity to live in freedom and in the pursuit of happiness, as our Declaration of Independence declared. Today the nations of the world are turning their faces in our direction and hearkening to the voices that promise peace and its blessings, that hold out the hope of outlawing war and the banishing forever of the fears and horrors of its recurrence.

APPEAL TO CONSCIOUSNESS OF THE WORLD

Today there is still peace in Europe. The sneers of the war lords at the President's appeal have died down. The challenge to the warring nations have been sounded, and the halt has been made in the war machines.

Let us, without regard to our political differences, extend a full measure of credit to our President, whose timely and friendly appeal at least turned the currents of European diplomacy in a new direction and, it is safe to say, halted the marching legions for sober second thought. Only a few men in each nation have a voice in making war or in preserving peace. On the decisions of these men—the statesmen of the world—hang the lives and the happiness of millions. It is gratifying that President Roosevelt, responsive to the throbbing hopes of America, has so happily phrased the voice of peace, a voice pleading for the preservation of our civilization and the happiness of whole nations.

Not until our American President had issued his call to the powers to respect the territorial and political rights of less powerful neighbors and to seek a peaceful means of settling their differences was the plight of the smaller nations brought to the attention and consideration of all the people of the world. With the issuance of this great state paper—for such I believe it will be acknowledged in the years to come—the war map for the moment was laid aside and today there is renewed hope everywhere that the way to permanent peace has been found. Mr. Roosevelt's appeal reached beyond mere heads of governments. It touched the consciousness of the world. It stirred to new categories of thought the souls of men irrespective of color, race, or creed. It brought out in challenging relief the horrors of war and the common sense of peaceful arbitration.

FEAR OF IMPENDING DISASTER DISPELLED

When our Chief Executive appealed to all nations, in his historic message of April 15, to make a final attempt at peaceful negotiations before a resort to arms, the world had been living for more than a year under the threatening shadow of impending disaster. Austria had disappeared fro mthe map. China had yielded up a vast territory to the invading armies of Japan. The Munich Pact of last autumn had been exacted as the price for a momentary truce from immediate war in Europe, and since then republican forms of government have yielded to authoritarian control under foreign influence in Czechoslovakia and Spain. The battle lines were drawn between groups of the most powerful nations of Europe and Asia, and the world seemed to be drawing closer, day by day, with evil and irresistible fatality, toward the brink of war.

Under these conditions, at one of the darkest periods in modern European history, the American President challenged the attention of all nations with his dramatic appeal for peace. He cast aside the outworn subtleties, indirection, and cumbersome rhetoric of diplomacy. With the lives of millions and the fate of civilization at stake, he addressed himself boldly and directly to the causes of war and to the means of rectifying the abuses and reconciling the differences which had undermined and weakened the whole structure of international security and peace.

The real import and significance of this message, as in the case of the Gettysburg Address, was grasped by few persons at the time of its actual delivery. From many, here and abroad, came comments of scorn and derision. The President was pictured as a Don Quixote making a futile and absurd gesture to check forces which he did not comprehend.

NOTHING TO GAIN AND EVERYTHING TO LOSE

We know now that a peace map was superimposed upon the war map of Europe as the direct result of President Roosevelt's message. He brought into the purview of all thinking people the nations, large and small, in both hemispheres and on all continents, which have nothing to gain and everything to lose in war, and who are ready to assert not only their liberty and independence but their right to live in a world at peace. He marshaled behind this country's protest against another wholesale assault on human life and civilization the enlightened opinion of all the Americas and a majority of the nations of Europe as well. He brought the weight of this opinion for peace to bear upon international policy even in those countries which had been taught to believe that war was inevitable and that the chief obligation of the people to their governments was to respond with another blood sacrifice of their sons.

We realize that we have no right to assume a holier-thanthou attitude toward other countries. We cannot solve their problems either by forcible intervention or by meddling, moralistic preachment. We can only advise and point to own experience with our border nations today, after the old unhappy days of war in the remote past. The fact remains that for more than 100 years we have lived in perfect peace, under a treaty of total disarmament, with a neighbor to the north which shares with us an exposed, unfortified boundary more than 3,000 miles in length. That nation forms a part of one of the great powers of the earth which, over much of our history, has been supreme as a maritime nation. Yet for a century not a soldier nor a ship has been needed to patrol either side of this northern border or to guard a single harbor or trade route of the Great Lakes.

On our south a weaker country shares with us a boundary greater in extent than that which separates any two of the larger nations of Europe. Let us be honest enough to admit that there was a time when the United States and the Republic of Mexico had not learned how to avoid conflict and to live in peace. But let us also recognize that these two countries today live side by side without fear of each other and without the necessity for erecting crushing armaments and bristling forts to dictate the terms of their mutual existence, diplomatic negotiations, and trade.

AMERICAN EXAMPLE FOR THE WORLD

The thousands of miles of unarmed, unfortified frontier of the United States, on the north with Canada and on the south with Mexico, today exemplify the American plan for peaceful and mutually productive living among neighboring peoples. We do not contrast the Great Lakes and the Rio Grande with the Dardanelles, the Danube, or the Rhine to affect a superior virtue over other peoples. But we do deplore a condition which has survived in the Old World as a relic of barbarism and long since been discarded in the New. We know that the American plan for peace is right in principle, that it does justice, and that it has worked. We know that the plan imposed upon the people of Europe for centuries to attain peace through the overpowering weight of superior forces brings no security; that in principle and practice it has miserably failed; and that it is, in a word, a mistake.

To every nation in the world, to the people of all races, colors, and creeds, President Roosevelt has appealed for a fair trial of the American plan for peace. That plan has been immeasurably advanced by the President's action and by the force of its own example, and we may justifiably hope and pray that in the end it will prevail. [Applause.]

THE LATE HONORABLE BERT LORD

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, it is with a feeling of personal loss that I announce the death of my dear friend and our distinguished colleague Bert Lord. He passed away this morning at 1 o'clock at the Naval Hospital.

I know I express the feelings of the New York delegation, and I believe, of the membership of this House, when I say he was a man of unusual friendliness; a man of sterling character, and one who had made a place for himself in the hearts of every one of his colleagues.

It is not my purpose today to review his splendid public career in his community, in his State, and in the Halls of Congress. That I shall do at some later time.

Phillips Brooks once said "Bad will be the day for every man when he becomes absolutely contented with the life that he is living, with the thoughts that he is thinking, with the deeds that he is doing; when there is not forever beating at the doors of his soul, some great desire to do something larger which he knows he was meant and made to do."

I have known Bert Lord for many years. I have observed his work in this House. He was a man who felt forever beating at the doors of his soul a great desire to do something larger which he knew he was meant and made to do.

Loved by his constituents regardless of their party affiliations, always looking forward to perform some kind deed or act for man, woman, or child, he was sent here not so much by the vote of his constituency as by their affection.

We all regret and deplore his passing. It came so suddenly that it was a terrific shock, and I know that the sympathy of the membership of this House goes out to his wife and to his son today.

I perhaps could enlarge on the character of his life and service, but I am not going to extend my remarks to that point, because many of his colleagues who have loved him have asked for an opportunity to express their sentiments here today. So for the moment, before offering a resolution, I am going to afford some of his colleagues an opportunity to say a few words.

The SPEAKER. With the permission of the Chair, the gentleman from New York may yield to such of his colleagues as he desires.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Gavagan].

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, it was indeed with sad heart and deep regret that I learned this morning of the loss of our dear colleague, the distinguished gentleman from my State, Hon. BERT LORD.

I remember meeting him the first time as a young man, coming shortly after the war to the assembly of the legislature of my State. He was then a member. For some peculiar reason he and I made friends the first day. I learned to love him and to admire him. He subsequently left the assembly and went to our State senate. Thereafter I came here. He then joined me in this great body. That covers a period now of almost 18 years, and in truth and fact may I say he was a great American, loyal to his party and devoted to his country, always the kind friend, irrespective of the political exigencies of the moment.

We need his type. We need his spirit today. I am certain that although we are admonished by the Holy Scripture that death comes as a thief in the night, judged upon the life and experience and devotion to duty, Bert Lord, when his summons came, answered it not like the quarry slave at night, but went forth, sustained and soothed by the knowledge and faith of a service well done.

We, his colleagues, today, I am certain, join his family in sending forth to Almighty God our prayer, "May God have mercy upon his soul."

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY].

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues from New York in lamenting the passing of Bert Lord. I, too, met him many years ago in our State legislature. I recall serving with him on a legislative committee, and I later served with him in our State senate. Throughout the years since I met him in 1924, I admired him and regarded him as a fine gentleman and a legislator who took great pride in his work.

BERT LORD was intensely partisan, but only insofar as it affected local issues. He always decided issues involving his country on a patriotic basis.

I am one of those who believe that a man should be judged by his deeds rather than by the words of his friends, and I am certain that our judgment of him will be gracious, generous, and liberal because we were so intimately acquainted with his ability.

I express to the family of Bert Lord my sincere sympathy, and to his constituents our deep sorrow in their great loss.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cole].

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, the people of central New York have lost a faithful and devoted servant in the untimely passing of our colleague, Mr. Lord. The greater part of his life was spent in public service and to that service he devoted the full measure of his ability, his energy, and his loyalty. A commoner himself, he was always on the alert to protect the interests of the common man and was always available to defend the rights of the poor and humble. A lover of life and of people, he ever had a happy word and a smile. His death is deeply mourned by his friends in the House who knew him best, and the people of New York realize that his passing takes from them a man whom they have set high in public esteem for his character and steadfast public service.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Treadway].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I add my word of personal regard for our departed Member and state my intimate personal association with him during the period of time he was a Member of this House. It has been my privilege to sit next to him on the Committee on the Library since he first came to Congress, and I have also had the privilege of traveling a great many miles with him over land and sea. In both his official capacity and personal relations with his fellow man, Bert Lord was a real man, a wholesome, common type of man such as the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cole] has just referred to.

It is needless for any of us to express our sympathy for his family, for they know they have every bit of the sympathy that is in the hearts of the Members of this House. So I simply wish to add my personal word of regard for his memory and sympathy for his family. The Congress and the country are the losers by the death of Bert Lord.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Taber].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, for over 20 years I have known Bert Lord intimately. As the years went by and I came to know him better, my respect for his integrity, his courage, and his faithfulness grew. He came to have a very marked influence on things that were happening in this country. He was loyal, devoted, and unselfish to the very end. We are going to miss this kind of man.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Fish].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, some 25 years ago I first met Bert Lord when he was in the State Legislature of New York. He has been in public life ever since that time.

He was a trained legislator, faithful, honest, and able. He devoted his entire life during the last 25 years to public service. He was a real American and beloved by his own constituents and his friends in the Congress of the United States. He was a credit to his own people, a credit to the State of New York, a credit to the Republican Party, which he served with distinction all these years, and a credit to our country. We who knew him loved him, and all of us, regardless of party, mourn his passing from this body.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEFAN].

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sorrow that we at this moment learn of the death of our friend and colleague the Honorable Bert Lord, who so ably represented the Thirty-fourth District of New York in this great legislative body during the past 4½ years. His death comes as a great shock to his multitude of friends and colleagues. The Nation, the people of his district, and the State of New York have lost a valuable public servant. Those of us who have been privileged to work with him during these past 4½ years realize that while his work has not been finished, the footprints of his service to mankind will never be erased.

Mr. Speaker, our beloved and departed colleague Bert Lord rendered valuable public service for many years. His record is one of which we are proud. Those of us who were intimately acquainted with him and who served with him in committees and on the floor of this House feel that our eulogies are but a whisper of our love and grateful memory of a man who devoted his life to the service of mankind. He gave that service with love in his heart to all humanity, and he rendered it in his familiar quiet, unassuming manner and without hope for public acclaim.

BERT LORD was a gentleman of the type who loved the common man. His personality attracted to him many friends, and his kindness won for him the respect and honor of every Member of the House of Representatives. He was always ready to help his colleagues without regard to party politics, and many of us who have labored with him can record here our appreciation of his great assistance in many of our legislative problems.

Mr. Speaker, our departed colleague, BERT LORD, was a builder. He built for the future. He was close to Mother Earth, and because of his early training in agriculture he was of unusual assistance in legislation pertaining to the farming industry of our Nation. Bert LORD was the "father" of our farm-to-market road program, and it was his leadership which resulted in bringing to the Nation a definite program in the construction of farm-to-market roads. BERT LORD was a great friend of the rural mail carriers of our country. He early recognized the value of the work done by those who deliver the mail to our rural population. Through his friendship with these rural carriers he received much of his inspiration that farmto-market roads must be constructed in order that the rural population of our Nation live more happily. The laws which have been enacted as the result of Bert Lord's ambitious farm-to-market road work will remain as one of the many footprints in his service to our Nation. It is only a part of a great history of real service which could be written about our departed colleague whose departure we mourn here today.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SENATE

THURSDAY, MAY 25, 1939

(Legislative day of Friday, May 19, 1939)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God and Heavenly Father, whose care hath tended us through the watches of the past night, let Thy mercy's beams of uncreated light impart gladness to our hearts as we go about our daily tasks. Unfold each fault that lurks within; remove each hidden shame glossed over by our pride; and, as the hours of day in order flow, defend the gates of every sense as deadly foes assail.

May no sinful word be on our tongue, but only simple truth; capture each idle, roving thought and thwart each deed of wrong, that we may be worthy of our high calling in Thy service, and eventually find ourselves to be "dowered with the hate of hate, the scorn of scorn, the love of love," as life puts on its perfect grace and light enfolds it in unending day. We ask it in the name of Him who is the eternal Light of Light, Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

SOCIAL SECURITY RESERVES--FINANCING LOW-INCOME GROUP HOUSING

Mr. LODGE presented a resolution of Stone Masons and Marble Setters' Union, No. 9, in the State of Massachusetts, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOCIAL-SECURITY RESERVES FOR FINANCING LOW-INCOME GROUP HOUSING

Whereas considerable difficulty is being experienced in getting housing, as distinct from slum-clearance housing, for the lowincome groups; and

Whereas the chief trouble is due to the fact that money, though plentiful in general, is too dear in open market for low-income groups to pay for out of their meager incomes, which, according to the Social Security Board, run from $1,185 down to $300 per year (and these represent 59 percent of all employables of the Nation); and

Whereas social-security reserves much more economically and legitimately could be used for this purpose, because they represent deductions from wages and salaries and the purchasing power of consumers, rather than paying the running expenses of the Federal Government which should come out of general taxation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That Congress be asked to immediately change the present law which gives the Secretary of the Treasury power to use the social-security reserves so that these may be made available for the construction of small houses of four, five, or more rooms, under private enterprise with predetermined wage rates, at a top price of $4,000 at 1 percent and 1 percent down payments are the properties in 20 to 30 years; and ment, amortizing in 20 to 30 years; and

FUNDS TO CONTINUE INVESTIGATIONS OF SO-CALLED CIVIL LIBERTIES COMMITTEE

Mr. HOLT presented a resolution of Local Union No. 4102, of the United Mine Workers of America, which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas there has been introduced in the United States Senate whereas there has been introduced in the United States Senate by Senators Lewis B. Schwellenbach and Sherman Downey a resolution to extend the activities of the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, known as the La Foilette Civil Liberties Committee, whereby there will be appropriated the additional sum of $100,000 to defray the expenses incident to further investigations to be undertaken by the committee;

Whereas the reports heretofore submitted to the Senate by Senators La Follette and Thomas of Utah, of the Civil Liberties Committee, pursuant to Senate Resolution No. 266, have been one of the most outstanding examples of legislation investigations and constitutes the most damning exposure of present-day conditions. in American industry which have ever been revealed by any legis-lative committee and have caused, among all classes of intelli-lative committee and have caused, among all classes of intelligent citizens, considerable speculation concerning the fundamental reasons for the necessity of any investigations of subversive activities in this country; and

Whereas it is the firm conviction of Local Union No. 4102, of the United Mine Workers of America, that the more thoroughly these practices of corporate interests are investigated and exposed by the Senate of the United States, whereby the guaranteed rights of free citizens of America are being openly controverted by a considerable portion of business enterprise, the sooner will it become apparent to the people and to the elected representatives of the people the imperative necessity for the enactment of remedial legislation whereby those unwarrantable and iniquitous practices shall be, for all time, declared by Federal statute to be unlawful: Therefore be it Therefore be it

Resolved by Local Union No. 4102 of the United Mine Workers of America, That we hereby strongly urge the Senate Committee to Audit and Control to favorably report and recommend the enactment of the Schwellenbach and Downey resolution providing for an additional appropriation of $100,000 for the continuation of the investigations of the La Follete Civil Liberties Committee; and be it further

Resolved. That copies of this resolution be sent to the members of the Senate Committee to Audit and Control and to Senators Schwellenbach, Downey, Neely, and Holt.

Mr. President, I ask consent to have incorporated in the RECORD and appropriately referred a resolution of the Senate of New Jersey requesting the President of the United States and the Secretary of State of the United States to urge the British Government to hold sacred the Balfour declaration and the Palestine mandate by maintaining an open-door immigration policy in Palestine for Jewish

The resolution of the Senate of New Jersey was referred to the Committee on Immigration and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution requesting the President of the United States and the Secretary of State of the United States to urge the British Gov-ernment to hold sacred the Balfour declaration and the Palestine mandate by maintaining an open-door immigration policy in Palestine for Jewish refugees

Whereas the peoples of civilized nations throughout the four corners of the world have witnessed since the World War a most unprecedented revival of the Holy Land, the cradle of all faiths, by the return of the Jews to Palestine; and

Whereas the Government of the United States has by joint resolution of the Congress of the United States unanimously endorsed the action of Great Britain in accepting the Palestine mandate as an obligation to facilitate the establishment of a national home for an obligation to facilitate the establishment of a national home for Jewish people in Palestine; and Whereas this responsibility and authority was accepted by Great Britain as a sacred trust in behalf of the civilized world; and Whereas under the provisions of the American-British Palestine Mandate Convention, signed December 3, 1924, approved by the United States Senate February 20, 1925, and officially ratified by the President of the United States March 2, 1925, Great Britain pledged that nothing incorporated in the agreement shall be modified unless such change shall have the acquiescence of the United States of America; and Whereas it is being reported that the British Government is con-

Whereas it is being reported that the British Government is contemplating the abrogation of its pledge to the Jewish people set forth in the Balfour declaration and embodied in the said Palestine mandate; and

Whereas people of all color, creed, and faith throughout the civ-ilized world are uniformly and deeply disturbed by these reports;

Whereas the miraculous achievements of the Jewish pioneers in Palestine, both spiritual and material, have garnered the high esteem and approbation of the entire world; and

whereas the unprophetic and unsettled situations in Europe leave Jewish people no alternative but to look toward Palestine as their principal haven of refuge; and

Whereas it is the opinion of the Senate of the State of New Jersey that the abandonment by Great Britain of her pledge and trust would close all paths of escape for Jews driven from many lands, and that such a course would be recognized by all enlightened peoples as a surrender to forces of violence, intolerance, prejudice, and hatred: Therefore be it

Resolved. That the President of the United States and Secretary of State of the United States be memorialized to acquaint the British Government with the fact that the United States looks to Great Britain to adhere to her commitments and hold sacred and inviolate the terms and spirit of the Balfour declaration and Palestine mandate by maintaining an open-door immigration policy in Palestine for Jewish refugees; and be it further Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to His Excellency, the President of the United States, and to the Secretary of State of the United States.

PUBLIC-WORKS PROGRAM

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor an address delivered by James M. Myles, vice president of the Operative Plasterers and Cement Finishers' International Association, before the convention of the Pennsylvania Federation of Labor at Philadelphia May 11, 1939, on the subject of public works, and also part of an editorial appearing in The Plasterer for May 1939.

There being no objection, the address and portion of the editorial were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the Recorp, as follows:

editorial were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Mr. President, officers, and delegates to this convention, it is my purpose to discuss with you the Public Works Administration program as compared to the "made-work" type of relief project. I intend to discuss from the standpoint of labor the benefits derived from past public-works programs and ask for your united support for legislation now pending in the Congress of the United States to continue the P. W. A.

The last appropriation for P. W. A. was made available on June 21, 1939. It made available $200,000,000 for Federal projects and $750,000,000 for loans and grants for non-Federal projects of States, school districts, municipalities, and other public agencies throughout the United States. The Public Works Administration Act of 1938 permitted the receipt of applications for loans and grants through September 30, 1938, and provided a deadline date of January 1, 1939, for the start of all construction work.

This appropriation provided the sponsors with funds for the construction of school buildings, auditoriums, city halls, courthouses, hospitals, colleges, dormitories, power and disposal plants, bridges, tunnels, traffic arteries, waterworks, and other worth-while public improvements. This building and construction program has made the P. W. A. one of the greatest employing factors in the history of our Nation.

The Public Works program has not only served the purpose of putting building and construction tradesmen and laborers to work at the job site but its purchasing power has extended to industries supplying construction with cement, stone, sand, lumber, clay products, copper, glass, paints, lead, lime, plaster, steel, power, tools, trucks, machinery, transportation, and other materials.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics has made a study of the manhours of labor furnished by the P. W. A. programs and the orders for miscellaneous industrial products which have been filled during this huge

The P. W. A. construction program in its entirety provides for the awarding of contracts under the competitive bidding system.

Its employment regulations recognize the rights of labor to bargain collectively.

Statistics tell us from the time of man that construction has been the greatest single employment force. It is this Nation's greatest single capital investment. It is one of the greatest forces toward diminishing unemployment and elevating the living conditions and standards of the citizens of this country. If we are to continue our war against unemployment and depression, we who are engaged in the building trades must unite our efforts to continue the Public Works Administration.

Congressman Joseph Starnes, Member of Congress from Alabama, has introduced in the House of Representatives a bill known as H. R. 4576, which provides for the continuation of the Public Works Authority and an appropriation of $500,000,000 for loans and grants for new construction projects. A similar bill has been introduced in the Senate by Senator James M. Mead, of New York, known as S. 2063. The Starnes-Mead bill provides for the release, in times of depression, of worth-while projects for immediate operatimes of depression, of worth-while projects for immediate opera-tion. It is a long-range program and should have the active tion. It is a long-range program and should have the active support of every building-trades worker.

This bill accepts the theory that P. W. A. should be retained as a permanent part of our Government structure. Long-range planning of public works is vitally necessary if we are to prepare to take up the slack in private building occurring during periods of depression. This bill recognizes that if we are to provide ways and means to transfer men from relief to pay rolls, some method must be employed which will enable employers in private industry to absorb them. Since the works projects undertaken by P. W. A. are let to private contractors this means that work is provided in private industry to the unemployed in their chosen trades, regardless of their relief status.

The plan proposed by Senator Mead and Congressman STARNES would permit loans and grants to public bodies as in the past, and in addition permits loans and grants to nonprofit corporations for the construction of hospitals, sewage treatment and disposal plants, and for elimination of stream pollution.

If this new program is made possible by Congress, it will result in the construction of projects costing over a billion dollars. Over 5,000 applications are now pending in the Public Works Administration which were filed prior to the expiration date for accepting new applications under the 1938 act. Since these applications have been approved, it would appear that they might be eligible for allotments if further funds are provided. In this connection I might point out that there are 966 approved applications, with estimated construction costs of $289,450,945 now pending in P. W. A. from Pennsylvania communities. Under past programs the general State authority of Pennsylvania received Federal aid which made possible a $65,000,000 institutional construction program, which included public buildings, State arsenals, armories, military reserves. cluded public buildings. State arsenals, armories, military reserves, State airports and landing fields, college and school buildings and additions, swimming pools, etc.

I am a firm believer in the Public Works program. I believe that every public dollar expended in this manner pays dividends. I ask your support in having the program continued and the nec-essary funds appropriated to relieve unemployment in the building trades and heavy industries

I appeal to this convention and all affiliated unions to contact local Members of Congress and Senators requesting their active support of the P. W. A. appropriation bills. The Starnes-Mead bill is the only pending bill in Congress which carries an appropriation for P. W. A.—keep this fact in mind—and the only bill which is the only pending bill in Congress which carries an appropriation for P. W. A.—keep this fact in mind—and the only bill which embraces the principles for which the American Federation of Labor stands. It is the only pending bill which continues the authority of P. W. A.—the agency which is one of the outstanding instruments of Government on which the A. F. of L. is dependent for a livelihood. We must support this legislation and appeal to our representatives in Congress to do so.

It has come to my attention that some of the Members of Congress to my attention that some of the Members of Congress to my attention that some of the Members of Congress to my attention that some of the Members of Congress to my attention that some of the Members of Congress to do so.

It has come to my attention that some of the Members of Congress are under the impression that a transfer of P. W. A. to the newly created Federal Works Agency, under the President's first reorganization plan, obviates the necessity for new legislation. This is very erroneous, and it should be stated here that unless the reorganization plan, obviates the necessity for new legislation. This is very erroneous, and it should be stated here that unless the Starnes-Mead bill is enacted into law the Public Works Administration ceases to exist and its authority expires. Unless this bill is enacted the more than 5,000 pending approved projects will not be put under construction and the members of our federation will lose the employment it carries with it.

I also want to leave with you this thought: That the responsibility of the Works Progress Administration, as originally intended by the Congress, is to provide work for those who are eligible for relief. This means white-collar employment, sewing projects, research projects, art projects, and the like. It should not embrace construction of any kind. The construction work should properly be undertaken by the Public Works Administration—the construction unit of Government—and I ask your support in securing congressional approval of such a plan. All building construction must be done on a contract basis under contracts which provide that the contractors shall pay the prevailing rate of wages. In this way only can the building-trades workers secure proper working conditions and ample wages. Wholesale operations in the construction will ultimately result in a break-down of the workers' morale and, what the construct. will ultimately result in a break-down of the workers' morale and, what is equally important, in his wage schedules. Any future relief programs must provide that construction projects shall be placed under the Public Works Administration to be successful. I ask your support to this end. It is suggested that you contact your Congressmen and Senators urging this provision in the next relief bill relief bill.

If we are successful in our drive to secure enactment of the Starnes-Mead public-works bill, and to secure amendments to any future relief legislation whereby construction work will be placed solely with the P. W. A., then we may be assured of a new work program which will permit the members of our federation to keep on working in their own trades and under normal and happy conditions. This, I believe, is the goal we all want to reach. Your ditions. This, I believe, is the goal we all want to reach. Your work in presenting the rights of our workers to Congress and making our needs known will surely be crowned with success. We need only to persevere and success is ours. I thank you.

[From the Plasterer for May 1939]

It seems strange that an administration in Washington fails to provide appropriations for other than relief workers. The real forgotten men are unemployed but they are not eligible for employment under present relief regulations. Hundreds of millions of dollars are being appropriated for building and construction work where 5 percent are eligible for employment as nonrelief workers and 95 percent of employables on W. P. A. must have a relief status. These percentages are provided for in the act of Congress. It will remain that way until we put forth effort to change it.

RESOLUTION OF SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, a few days ago the Southern Baptist Convention met in Oklahoma City. At that time the news agencies sent throughout the Nation a statement regarding a resolution which had been considered and adopted by the convention. I know it is not possible to correct such statements after they have once been published; but it was so unfair—although I do not charge anyone with intentional unfairness—that I am going to ask in a moment or two to have printed in the RECORD the resolution referred to, a copy of which I have before me.

The resolution, which was an undertaking to restate the articles of faith of the Baptist Church, was submitted to me and also submitted to the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] and the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. George]. The newspaper account said that the resolution attacked the national administration, that it attacked the Catholic Church, and that it did many things which should not have been done if, in reality, they had been done.

In view of the very high regard in which I have always held my Catholic friends in Kentucky and, I believe, the high regard in which they have held me, it is unthinkable that I would have been a party to making any statement reflecting on the late Pope Pius, as the newspapers said was done. The late Pope Pius once did me the honor to grant me a private audience, and I have among my prized possessions a memento which he gave me on that occasion.

Today I received a letter from Mr. Rufus W. Weaver, the executive secretary of the District of Columbia Baptist Convention, in which he encloses a copy of the resolution which was adopted at Oklahoma City. He says:

I am enclosing the pronouncement upon religious liberty as passed by the Southern Baptist Convention unanimously last Sat-urday. The press blundered in the interpretation of this document and linked it up with certain resolutions which were introduced by messengers to the convention for the purpose of making an attack upon the administration. This document, as passed by the convention, was carefully studied and revised by two able committees and, in my judgment, strengthened the statement. I thank you most warmly for the part you took in the preparation of this proposurement. of this pronouncement.

The only direct reference I find in the resolution to the Catholic Church-and I find none relating to the national administration-is contained in the closing paragraph, under the heading of "Defenders of Religious Liberty":

Believing religious liberty to be not only an inalienable human right, but indispensable to human welfare, a Baptist must exercise himself to the utmost in the maintenance of absolute religious liberty for his Jewish neighbor, his Catholic neighbor, his Protestant neighbor, and for everybody else.

How our newspapers could get the idea that the Southern Baptist Convention had made an attack upon the present administration or the Catholic Church, I do not know; but I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Congres-SIONAL RECORD the resolution which was adopted, together with the letter of transmittal by Dr. Weaver.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so

The letter and resolution are as follows:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BAPTIST CONVENTION, Washington, D. C., May 24, 1939.

Hon. M. M. LOGAN. United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR LOGAN: I am enclosing the pronouncement upon religious liberty as passed by the Southern Baptist Convention unanimously last Saturday. The press blundered in the interpretation of this document and linked it up with certain resolutions which were introduced by messengers to the convention for the purpose of making an attack upon the administration. This document, as passed by the convention, was carefully studied and revised by two able committees, and in my judgment, strengthened the statement. I thank you most warmly for the part you took in the preparation of this pronouncement.

With every expression of esteem, I remain Cordially yours.

Cordially yours,

RUFUS W. WEAVER.

A PRONOUNCEMENT UPON RELIGIOUS LIBERTY PASSED BY THE SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION UNANIMOUSLY MAY 20, 1939, OKLAHOMA

No issue in modern life is more urgent or more complicated than the relation of organized religion to organized society. rise of the European dictators to power has changed fundamentally the organic law of the governments through which they exercise sovereignty, and as a result the institutions of religion are either suppressed or made subservient to the ambitious national programs of these new totalitarian states.

FOUR THEORIES OF THE RELATION OF CHURCH AND STATE

There are four conceptions of the relation of church and state:

1. The church is above the state, a theory held by those who claim that their ecclesiastical head is the vicar of Christ on earth.

- 2. The church is alongside the state, a theory held by the state churches of various countries.
- 3. The state is above the church, a theory held by the totalitarian governments.
- 4. The church is separate from the state, championed by the Baptists everywhere, and held by those governments that have written religious liberty into their fundamental laws.

BAPTISTS OPENED THE DOOR OF RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

Three hundred years have passed since the establishment under Baptist leadership of the first civil government in which full re-ligious liberty was granted to the citizens forming the compact. Inglous liberty was granted to the citizens forming the compact. The original document, preserved in the city hall, Providence, R. I., is a covenant of citizens: "We, whose names are hereunder, desirous to inhabit in the town of Providence, do promise to subject ourselves in active or passive obedience to all such orders or agreements as shall be made for public good for the body in an orderly way by the major assent of the present inhabitants, masters of families, incorporated together into a town fellowship, and such others whom they shall admit unto themselves only in civil things." These four concluding words opened wide the door to religious liberty.

PROVIDED AN ASYLUM FOR THE PERSECUTED

This document was written 300 years ago by Roger Williams, a Baptist minister and a student under Lord Coke, who had been banished from the Colony of Massachusetts for his espousal of the freedom of conscience. The founder of a civil Commonwealth called the Providence Plantations, he started a political movement which made the Colony of Rhode Island the asylum of the persecuted and the home of the free.

LAID THE FOUNDATIONS OF RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

The Baptists of England, through Leonard Busher, had in 1614 The Baptists of England, through Leonard Busher, had in 1614 pleaded with James I for freedom of conscience. Roger Williams became the apostle of religious liberty in colonial America. Dr. John Clark, the pastor of the Baptist Church of Newport, R. I., as agent of the Rhode Island Colony and Providence Plantations, secured from Charles II in 1663 a charter in which the religious liberty claimed by the colonists was guaranteed through a royal decree. For the first time in the history of the world a civil government was founded that guaranteed to its inhabitants absolute religious freedom. religious freedom.

PLEADED FOR THE RELIGIOUS RIGHTS OF ALL MEN

The Baptists of the Colony of Virginia, where between 1767 and 1778, 42 Baptist ministers were jailed for preaching the gospel, through repeated memorials pleaded with the authorities for religious liberty. Favored by the leadership of Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, George Mason, John Leland, and other lovers of freedom, they secured the free exercise of religion through the passade of Bill of Rights in 1785. Not content with the winning of religious equality in Virginia, Baptists scrutinized the terms of the Federal Constitution and were largely instrumental in securing the passage of the first amendment, which declares that "Congress that make you have recognized and the properties are establishment of religious parts." shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or pro-hibiting the free exercise thereof." As to this, see the letter of George Washington to the Baptists of Virginia.

Religious liberty, as our Baptist forefathers defined it, was an emancipation from governmental and all other coercive restric-tions, that thwarted the free exercise of religion, and the high purpose to achieve a Christlike character.

BAPTISTS STRESS SPIRITUALITY

The principles that animate the activities of the Baptists, principles which they hold clearly to be taught in the New Testament, are the worth of the individual; the necessity of the new birth; the preservation of Christian truth in Christian symbols; spirituality, or the free pursuit of Christian piety; the persuading of others through personal testimony, by the life of example, the preaching of the Gospel, and the creation of Christian institutions, to the end that the unbelieving will be reconciled to God through a personal faith in Jesus Christ; the organization of groups of obedient believers into churches of Christ, democratic in the processes and theocratic in the principles of their government, and the continued uplifting of human society through the Spirit of Christ and the ideals of His kingdom, having as its final objective the establishment of the eternal, unchanging purpose of Almighty God in the hearts of men and the institutions of mankind. The principles that animate the activities of the Baptists, prin-God in the hearts of men and the institutions of mankind.

AFFIRM THE COMPETENCY OF THE HUMAN SOUL IN RELIGION

The conception of the dignity of the individual, as held by Baptists, is grounded in the conviction that every soul possesses the capacity and the inalienable right to deal with God for himself, and to deprive any soul of his right of direct access to God is to usurp the prerogatives of the individual and the function of God.

FREE CHURCHES WITHIN A FREE STATE

Standing as we do for the principle of voluntariness in religion, grounded upon the competency of the human soul, Baptists are essentially antagonistic to every form of religious coercion or perse-We admit to our membership only those who give evidence that they are regenerated, but we recognize gladly that the grace of God is not limited to those who apply to us, and that our spiritual fellowship embraces all who have experienced the new birth and are walking in newness of life, by whatever name they may be called. We hold that the Church of Christ, which in the Bible is called "the body of Christ," is not to be identified with any denomination or church that seeks to exercise ecclesiastical authority, but includes all the regenerated whoever and wherever they are, as these are led by the Holy Spirit. This church is a body without formal organization, and therefore cannot enter into contractual relations on any basis with the state. For this reason Baptists believe in free churches within a free state.

TODAY BAPTISTS FEEL CONSTRAINED TO DECLARE THEIR POSITION

Since every session of the Congress considers legislation that raises the question as to the relation of the Federal Government to the institutions and the agencies of religion, and since recently many tendencies have appeared that involve the freedom of religion and conscience, and furthermore, since there are some State constitutions which do not have embodied in them the Bill of Rights of the Federal Constitution, southern Baptists feel constrained to declare their position and their convictions.

THE TREND TOWARD PATERNALISM

Today the trend of government, even in democratic countries, lies in the direction of greater centralization. The philanthropic activities of the churches within the United States are being taken over by the Government. The defective, the indigent, and the dependent groups of our social order have long been supported from public funds. The greatest charity agency on earth today is our Federal Government. More and more the people are looking to the state to provide. As a nation we are becoming paternalistic. Efforts are now being made to place in the hands of the Government the pensioning of those who are employed by the churches and the agencies that serve them, to grant to sectarian schools financial aid from tax-raised funds, and to support from public funds institutions that are established and managed by sectarian bodies.

BAPTISTS CONDEMN THE UNION OF CHURCH AND STATE

BAPTISTS CONDEMN THE UNION OF CHURCH AND STATE

Baptists hold that the coercion of religious bodies through special taxes, the use of tax-raised funds for sectarian schools, and the appropriation of public money to institutions created to extend the power and influence of any religious body, violate the spirit of the first amendment and result in the union of state and church.

OPPOSE SPECIAL FAVORS EXTENDED TO ANY ECCLESIASTICAL BODY

We oppose the establishing of diplomatic relations with any ecclesiastical body, the extension of special courtesies by our Government to any ecclesiastical official as such, and the employment of any of the branches of our national defense in connection with religious services that are held to honor any ecclesiastical leader.
All such violations of principle must be resisted in their beginnings.

CITIZENS OF TWO COMMONWEALTHS

We acknowledge ourselves to be citizens of two commonwealths, one earthly, the United States, the other heavenly, the Kingdom of God; and we claim the right to be good citizens of both. We recognize the sovereignty of the state and we give allegiance to the state, but we cannot give to the state the control of our consciences. We must obey God rather than men.

The government resorts to coercion: we use persuasion. The

The government resorts to coercion; we use persuasion. The government has authority over the acts of its citizens; we have to do with the motives. The business of the government is to make good laws; our business is to make good citizens who continue to good laws; our business is to make good citizens who continue to demand the enactment of better laws, embodying higher and still higher ethical standards. The end of governmental administration is equal justice under law. The end of our endeavor is the establishment of the will of God in the hearts and institutions of men. If one of us accepts an office in the Government, he recognizes it not only as a public trust but also as a divine entrustment; for the powers that be are ordained of God. In a democracy like ours it is possible to be a loyal American and a devoted Christian. This is true because religious liberty is an essential part of our fundamental law. fundamental law.

DEFENDERS OF RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

Believing religious liberty to be not only an inalienable human right but indispensable to human welfare, a Baptist must exercise himself to the utmost in the maintenance of absolute religious liberty for his Jewish neighbor, his Catholic neighbor, his Protestant neighbor, and for everybody else. Profoundly convinced that any deprivation of this right is a wrong to be challenged, Baptists condemn every form of compulsion in religion or restraint of the free consideration of the claims of religion.

We stand for a civil state, "with full liberty in religious concernments."

REGULATION OF MODES OF TRANSPORTATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2009) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by extending its application to additional types of carriers and transportation and modifying certain provisions thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I desire to discuss the general policy involved in the bill now before the Senate.

First, I wish to state that I regret that I cannot agree with the majority of the members of the committee. I may be wrong and they may be right in their point of view. I do not question theirs, and I hope no one will question mine. I have never sat on a committee of which some of the members have worked so hard as have the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler] and the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED].

Everyone knows that with the amount of committee work that has been going on it has been impossible for most of the Members to attend all the hearings; and, in my opinion, no one knows any more about this bill than do the two Senators who have been sponsoring it on the floor.

The general policy of including waterways in regulation is a policy with which I cannot agree. We are being regulated to death in this country. In the case of the railroads it was found necessary in the public interest to regulate them. They were guilty of practices such as discrimination against shippers by rebates, discrimination in rates against communities, and other reprehensible practices which made it necessary to to regulate them in the public interest; but there has been no demand for regulation of the water carriers on behalf of the public interest, because no charge has been made that these vicious practices have been engaged in by those engaged in common-carriage transport business upon our inland waterways.

This bill has had a varied birth. It was first proposed by a committee of six appointed by the President, consisting of three railroad executives and three members of the railroad brotherhoods. Those representing the railroad executives I do not know. I know the three members of the railroad brotherhoods, and I have the highest respect for them as men and as citizens; and I very much regret that on this general policy I cannot agree with their point of view.

Then we had what was called the Fletcher bill, prepared by the attorney for the Association of Railway Executives. Then we had the bill which was presented to the committee by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Truman] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler], and which now has been amended so many times that it is an entirely different bill. The purpose of it is said to be to help the railroads, and God knows something certainly ought to be done for the railroads; but it is not only the railroads that need assistance in these times. The records show that their income has been about as good as that of any other industry. They are in trouble, however, but so is everyone else. They suffer as a result of the general economic condition of the country. Unless we place the general economic condition of the country on a sound basis, neither the railroads nor any other industry can be saved. That is something that must be done

I am not willing to deny that the railroads are the backbone of our transportation system, and I am as much concerned about their welfare as can be any other citizen, because no one can have an earnest concern for the welfare of the country unless he has an earnest concern for the welfare of the transportation industry. But we must remember that the transportation industries have been promoted by the public for the benefit of the public, for the benefit of commerce, to serve commerce in order to serve all of the people. It is said that the waterways have been promoted at public expense and the railroads at private expense. They were both created and both were promoted to reduce costs of transportation for the general benefit of commerce and business and the general population of the country, and they have both been developed at public expense. In the development of the country, when transportation by stagecoach and oxcart became too expensive, the Government started to promote the building of railways to reduce the cost of transportation. They subsidized the railways. The public gave grants of land for rights-of-way. The Northern Pacific alone was given some of the finest and richest land in the world. They got a quantity of land equal to the entire area of Germany, to mention only one road, and they got it from the Federal Government, and did not have to pay taxes on it. But that is past history. I mention that only to show that the general public have been interested, and they have paid to develop transportation for the benefit of commerce.

The higher rates of transportation are raised, the greater is the tax on transportation. It is a tax on production as well as a tax on transportation. The railroads developed monopolistic practices among other vicious practices, and therefore they had to be regulated. The higher the tax on transportation is placed, the higher the tax on commerce, the less goods will be transported, the less we can manufacture, and the more unemployment we shall have. So one of the most important issues before any country is to obtain transportation of goods from one section of the country to the other as cheaply as possible; and that applies specifically to a country so large as ours, with its vast distances. We are not a country; we are a continent; and to get the goods from one part of the continent to the other is a matter of vast public interest and concern.

We are in the habit of talking about the depression since 1936, and some talk about the depression of 1929. I have seen no break in the general downward trend dating back to the time of the World War.

What happened to our transportation system over that period? During the World War freight rates were raised 33 percent, and it had an immediate effect upon the country. Later rates were reduced 10 percent, then again they were raised 33 percent. What did that mean to the country? It was a 33-percent increase in the tax on commerce by the imposition of higher rates by transportation. It meant that a farmer selling a bushel of wheat or a carload of wheat for export, the price being based on Liverpool, had to pay 33 percent more to deliver the wheat at Liverpool, if delivered to the coast by rail, than it cost him before. The rate on everything we exported that was carried to the coast by rail was increased 33 percent, which resulted in a reduction in the price of the goods shipped to that extent. The same result followed if the goods were shipped from one part of the country to a terminal market. No one will deny that the farmer had to pay the increase. If the farmer in the Northwest bought a ton of coal, or a binder, or some other piece of machinery, or a sewing machine coming from New England, he paid the freight on that, too, and that was increased 33 percent.

What happened to the farmer? I do not mean to say that the transportation tax was the heaviest tax he paid, but, so far as taxes are concerned, I think his transportation tax is more than the local taxes, the State taxes, and the county taxes on his farm.

What happened to the railroads, and what happened to the country as a result? The Midwest, long distances away from the terminal markets, immediately began to feel the effect. The Transportation Act was passed in 1920, and the census showed that from 1920 to 1930, 14 States in the interior, the landlocked part of the United States, failed to keep up with the trend of population; as a matter of fact, they lost population during those 10 years. Fourteen Midwest States lost 17 Members in the House of Representatives, and the States which had water transportation gained 25 Members in the House of Representatives, because industries started to leave the interior on account of the high freight rates. They moved to where they could get cheap water transpor-

What has happened to the farmer? The Federal Government records show that in the last 10 years the farmers of this country have been sold out to the extent of 30 percent through foreclosures of mortgages. That means that 1 out of every 3 has been sold out. If that rate continues, as it is continuing now, in 20 years another 60 percent will be sold out also.

We have not solved the farm problem, we have not solved the transportation problem. We have spent a great deal of money developing the public waterways. On the map here on the wall, which I have prepared, we have the Great Lakes shown, covering the northern part of the country. There are these channels between the Lakes and the barge canal to New York. How much have we spent on these waterways? We have spent on the Great Lakes, on the American side, $265,000,000; and in 1937, 92,000,000 tons of freight were carried on those Lakes. Only 3 percent was transported by common carrier. The rest was carried by private bulk carriers owned by the large corporations, which take advantage of the waterways and haul their products by water wherever they can use the waterways, but charge rail rates to the consumer. As a result the consumer of the commodities does not get the benefit of the development of the waterways. But these corporations are not to be regulated. It is only the common carrier, which carries freight for the ordinary man who has something to ship, that is to be regulated, for the benefit of the railroads. How is it going to help the railroads if the railroads get only the 3 percent which is common carriage?

It is said that there are only three things which will help solve the railroad problem. One is Government ownership, the second is higher rates, and the third is an increase in business. The enactment of the pending bill will not increase the general business of the country, it does not provide for Government ownership, and it is said it is not for the purpose of raising rates. The only assumption that is permissible, under the bill, and according to the debate which has been proceeding, is that the common carriers, which on the Great Lakes carry only 3 percent of the total tonnage, and the river waterways, where there was carried by common carrier only 4½ percent out of a total of 161,000,000 tons in 1937—these common carriers, carrying on the one hand 41/2 percent and on the other 3 percent of common carriage for the benefit of anyone who has something to ship, are the ones who are to be regulated. And for what purpose if not for the purpose of raising rates?

To the best of my knowledge, the water carriers have not complained that they are not getting rates sufficient to be compensatory. It is true that two carriers came and stated that they were for regulation. One was the Mississippi Valley Barge Line, who, no doubt, are rendering a public service. There were only two which stated they were for regulation. There were about a dozen others which were opposed to it. But they are small. With the exception of the Government corporation, the Mississippi Valley Barge Line is the biggest one of them all. It is owned by the Atlas Corporation, the biggest investment trust in the United States, if not in the world, a corporation with very mysterious but powerful financial backing, which went into the market at the very depth of the depression and bought valuable corporations which were in distress. They are operating a barge line. They are here. They want regulation, because in the bill there is a provision calling for a certificate of convenience and necessity. No one under the bill can start a barge line and operate on the Mississippi River, or other inland waterway, unless he can show there is a public need and a necessity.

The report of the Maritime Commission states the case very plainly, that those things are used in order to create monopolies, to keep out competition, and having already been on the ground and operating, the Mississippi Barge Line does not want new companies to come in when the 9-foot channel in the Mississippi River is completed, as it will be by the spring of 1940.

If these waterways are to be used, why not let anyone who can show responsibility and honesty use them-anyone giving service to the public?

I have here an editorial which I think is illustrative of what is taking place all through the country. I happen to have personal knowledge of some of the facts stated in the editorial. It is from the New Ulm Journal, and I desire to read it to the Senate. New Ulm is a city in Minnesota. The editorial reads:

New Ulm's city council votes for natural gas. The city light plant and the Eagle Roller Mill have already indicated they will use gas. The Interstate Power Co. which supplies gas now to cur business houses and homes has announced that they too will soon use this natural gas hook-up.

And so it is now the turn of the railroad-company officials to scratch their tired, gray heads. The coming of natural gas to New Ulm reduces their freight load. New Ulm will use gas in its industries and eventually in their homes and this eliminates coal. As the use of natural gas grows the use of coal goes down and this affects the railroad companies. The old order changeth and the old gives way to new but in the meantime the railroad companies have to run their freight trains.

Multiply New Ulm's experience by hundreds and perhaps thousands of other communities and you see one more thing wrong with the railroads today. These companies will have to adjust themselves to a changing world but it is hard to move a railroad bed around or make adjustments as fast as the world moves ahead.

This states a fact, and such things are happening all over the country. I know from personal experience that when the coal bill was passed, when industries linked together to control the price of coal, I thought I could see that it was going to ruin the coal business, because it was going to drive the consumers of heat units to the competitors of coal. I have noticed in the last few years, since that measure was enacted, that people are quitting the use of coal, and are using gas or oil. They find those substitutes cheaper, and of course more convenient.

It is too bad that that is so. But people must remember that the most unchangeable law of nature is that there can be nothing but constant change. Instead of failing to recognize the inevitability of change, instead of trying to stop the forces of nature, instead of trying to stop the forces of science, and the law of life itself, which demands that there shall be constant change in life, we should take advantage of those changes and adjust ourselves accordingly, and not try vainly to turn the sea back by pushing it back with our hands.

The law of diminishing returns, in my opinion, affects every industry in the United States, not only the railroads and the coal industry, but every other industry. The idea that the more you charge the more you will have can be pushed so far that you will get no return.

Unless the proposed regulation has for its purpose to drive out of business the common carriers on the waterways, which are carrying only 4½ percent on the rivers and 3 percent on the Great Lakes, what is the purpose of the bill? The result of the proposed regulation of water rates will be to drive the business to the railroads. Even if the railroads should get all the water-borne business it would not save them; but the bill would destroy the very purpose for which the waterways were developed. They were developed for the benefit of the public as well as for the benefit of the railroads.

The Government has supported the railroads in every way possible to help the public interest, by permitting increases in rates, which I think was a mistake. For instance, a year and a half ago the eastern railroads raised their passenger rate from 2 cents to $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents a mile, and they lost so much business they had to go back to 2 cents, where they are now. The western railroads refused to yield, and retained their low rate, and made money on their passenger traffic all the time.

I do not see how it is going to help the railroads to regulate the common carriers on the inland waterways, and it is not going to help the waterways and the water carriers. No charge of discriminatory practices of any kind has been made against these water carriers, and so there has been no demand made for the protection of the public against vicious practices.

Mr. President, the demand for waterways and cheaper transportation came as the result of the increase in freight rates. So at public expense we developed and have nearly completed the inland waterways outlined on the map hanging on the rear wall of the Senate Chamber. I indicate the Warrior River waterway. Here [indicating] is the coastal canal, here is the lower Mississippi, and here are the Ohio, the Missouri, the Illinois, and the upper Mississippi.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. For the purpose of the Record, will the Senator not be more specific in describing the States served by the waterway system?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes. Here [indicating] we have the great Ohio River, developed some years ago by canalization, making a 9-foot channel serving Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Kentucky, Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, and, of course, the neighboring States, because the benefits, whatever they are, are reflected back to them.

Here [indicating] we have the Monongahela and the Allegheny Rivers. Upon the Monongahela and the Allegheny is carried all the coal for the great metropolitan area of Pittsburgh. The canalization of these rivers was fought bitterly by the Pennsylvania Railroad. The Allegheny and the Monongahela were formerly nothing but mountain creeks, but, by canalization and putting in dams, 9-foot channels were developed. Prior to the completion of these waterways coal was hauled into the metropolitan area of Pittsburgh at the rate of $1.21 a ton, but because of the canalization of the rivers coal is now hauled to the metropolitan area of Pittsburgh for 21 cents a ton.

As the result of bringing cheap coal to Pittsburgh to meet the iron ore from Minnesota and Michigan, Pittsburgh became the greatest steel center of the country, and the amount of freight carried by the Pennsylvania Railroad was increased from 40,000,000 tons a year to 160,000,000 tons a year. So, instead of destroying the railroad, the improvement of the waterways produced so much business that the freight carried by the Pennsylvania Railroad increased by more than 120,000,000 tons a year.

The countries in Europe have discovered that the carrying of freight on the waterways is inherently so cheap that it can be hauled for one-sixth of the cost of hauling it by rail. In Europe we find, as a result of the use of improved waterway, that commerce has been increased and business has been increased because freight can be moved by water which cannot be moved at the high rail rates. As a result it helps the railroads also because it produces more freight for the railroads to carry.

Steel from Pittsburgh is carried to the Mississippi Valley. The barges cannot travel up to Fargo, N. Dak., to Omaha, Nebr., or to Topeka, Kans. The railroads must haul it there. The greater the amount of freight which is moved up the inland waterways—freight which otherwise would not be moved because of the high rail freight rates—the more freight the railroads will have to carry into interior points which are not reached by the inland waterways.

France, Germany, and Holland, which own their own railroads, have spent hundreds of millions of dollars to develop their waterways in order to help their commerce, and so give business to the railroads.

There is no regulation of barges in central Europe, for instance. The owners live on their little barges with their families. If anyone wants to have some freight moved, the barge owners bid with each other to get the tonnage. There is no regulation of them at all so far as rates are concerned.

Mr. President, 161,000,000 tons of freight were transported on the Great Lakes last year. By way of the New York Barge Canal and through the Erie Canal freight is carried to New York. So the products of a vast area reaches the ocean by water, and this area has available to it by water every port in the world. We have spent public funds in completing the channel of the Mississippi River. That gives an outlet to this landlocked territory here [indicating], making available to it every port on the seas and on the rivers, so that freight may be carried by water which cannot now be moved because of high rail rates.

I have always held the opinion that, instead of hurting the railroads waterways will help them. Those who pretend to speak for the railroads seem to think that if they can take away the business which is carried on the rivers, amounting to 4½ percent of the total, and the 3 percent of the total which is carried on the Great Lakes—the railroads will be saved. They seem to think they can make the Senate believe that will save the railroads. But, Mr. President, I do not see how that is going to help the railroads.

Private and contract carriers are owned by many large corporations. That is an existing practice. The large oil companies, the steel and cement companies use the public waterways. They use the waterways which have been built at the taxpayers' expense for the benefit of the public, to help commerce, to help the manufacturer. The use of the waterways helps the manufacturer, because if his products can be shipped at such a low cost that people can afford to buy them, he will have an opportunity to produce and to employ labor. For that purpose the waterways were dedeveloped.

The great monopolies which own the private carriers and contract carriers use the waterways; but, through their system of price fixing, the public does not get the benefit, because those monopolies charge the rail rate after hauling their own commodities on their own boats.

Take, for instance, the situation with respect to Pittsburgh, the great steel area. Steel is hauled from Pittsburgh, or from Gary, perhaps, to Duluth. There is a steel plant at Duluth. When the Pittsburgh-plus system of price fixing was in existence one could take a truck and go to the steel plant at Duluth and get barbed wire or any other steel product made at Duluth, but he paid for it the added price of the rail rate from Pittsburgh. The manufacturers could haul it down the Mississippi on their own cargo boats, and charge the price plus the rail rate to destination. That was a monopolistic practice. It was unfair to their competitors who were not sufficiently powerful enough to have their own boats. They could undersell them and drive them out of business. If there were no competitors in that area, they would charge the usual price plus railroad freight, and they would haul the commodities for less than one-sixth of the railroad rate.

These water carriers are not going to be regulated. The corporations to which I refer are owned and controlled by the same interests which control the railroads. As is well known, two great banking houses of the country, generally speaking, control the large railroads of the country. Those in control use the industries to sell goods to the railroads. When there is money to be made, they ship much tonnage, using the public highways and keeping the profit. They do not give it to the railroads, because the railroads are public utilities, and the stocks and bonds are held to a large extent by the general public and by life-insurance companies. The insiders who control the industries use the public highways, built at public expense, for their own personal gain, and do not give to the public the benefit of the waterways built at public expense.

It has been decided that we are now going to regulate water carriers. However, when we grant permission freely to use highways built at public expense, I think we have a right to put certain restrictions on the practices of shippers, in order that the public may have the benefit of the public money spent on waterways.

The Senator from Montana stated that some years ago he introduced a bill to stop base price fixing, but he said it was very difficult to secure its passage. I know he is in favor of remedying the situation, and I am quite confident that every Member of the Senate, including the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Reed], who has practiced before the Interstate Commerce Commission, who has worked very hard on the bill, and who is recognized as an expert on these questions, will support the amendment which I intend to offer. My amendment merely provides that anyone using the public waterways and highways, which are built at public expense, shall be prohibited from selling his goods at destination to consumers at a price which includes a charge for rail rates when no railroad service has been used.

Mr. President, I send to the desk the amendment which I intend to offer and ask that the clerk read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the clerk will read the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add the following new section:

Subsection (a) of section 5 of the act entitled "An act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes," approved September 26, 1914, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"For the purposes of this act it shall be deemed to be an unfair or deceptive act or practice in commerce for any person, partnership, or corporation to so fix the price at point of destination of any goods or commodities transported in commerce, that such price includes a charge for transportation, based upon railroad rates, for any part of the transportation of such goods or commodities which was not conducted by railroad."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I leave the amendment on the desk temporarily.

I do not want to find any fault, and I do not want to be understood as finding any fault, with any member of the committee or with any Member of the Senate who has committed himself to vote for the bill. I think it would be bad policy to pass it.

Mr. Joseph Eastman has often been mentioned in the Senate as an authority. I do not know how many Senators are familiar with his views about this bill, but among other things he mentions the vast importance and the vast ramifications of a codification or rewriting of the Interstate Commerce Act, dating back to 1887, with hundreds of Supreme Court decisions affecting and interpreting the act.

Mr. Eastman said in his testimony:

If a codification of the present parts I and II of the Interstate Commerce Act into a single combined measure is to be accomplished, the preliminary work should, in my judgment, be done by a public body which is directed to make a report indicating clearly and specifically all of the changes in existing law which it recommends and the reasons therefor, so that all interested parties may have full knowledge of what is proposed. It is an imposition on those interested and directly concerned to confront them, in the middle of a legislative session, with a codified and combined bill of 182 pages without any such explanatory report, and make it necessary for them to find out as best they can what the bill would do and present their views on short notice.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator is familiar with the fact, is he not, that Commissioner Eastman has repeatedly recommended and the Commission has recommended that water carriers be regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes; I am aware of that fact.

Mr. WHEELER. Commissioner Eastman said he thought that the bill was not the way to codify the law. He was in agreement with all the purposes, but he thought this was not the proper way to do it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is correct. He was in perfect agreement with the idea of the regulation of the waterways.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. Is it not a fact that the United States Maritime Commission has been conducting an investigation in reference to rates on water-borne transportation?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes. I learned that fact today, from the statement of Admiral Land. I thought his statement was very good.

Mr. OVERTON. Has the Interstate Commerce Commission made any investigation whatsoever as to rate structures in connection with water-borne transportation or the broad field indicated by Commissioner Eastman in the quotation which the Senator read from his testimony?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, may I answer that?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The quotation I have just read refers specifically to the difficulty of recodifying and rewriting in a hurry a basic law of such importance without having a public body do it. In another place Commissioner Eastman said: "This was not written by a public body." He mentioned the fact that it was written by a railroad lawyer. It was written by railroad lawyers and railroad labor, he said, undoubtedly with good intentions to help the country by helping the railroads. However, such persons must necessarily think first of helping the railroads, he said. I am as willing as anyone to help the railroads if it can be done in such a way as not to act to the detriment of the general commerce and business of the country.

Mr. OVERTON. I think a fair inference to be drawn from the statement made by Commissioner Eastman, which the Senator has just quoted, is that the Congress of the United States should not authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission or any other body to undertake to apply the statutory law, rules, regulations, and jurisprudence which have been gradually built up and evolved in reference to transportation by rail, to an entirely different method of transportation; that is, to water transportation.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is correct.

Mr. OVERTON. And before an attempt of that kind is made by Congress, some public body clothed with authority ought to make a full and complete investigation and report to the Congress. What I want to know is, Has that been done by any public body?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that when Mr. Eastman was Coordinator he made a complete study of the subject of regulation of water carriers, and recommended to the Congress of the United States in 1935, again in 1936, and again in 1937 that in the public interest the water carriers should be regulated.

Mr. OVERTON. Was that investigation made by him? Mr. WHEELER. By him as Coordinator.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. How long has it been since he made the investigation?

Mr. WHEELER. It was made in 1935. Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Was a report made?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; a report was made to Congress recommending such regulation. When we talk about the Maritime Commission, let me call attention to the fact that for years, almost since its inception, the Interstate Commerce Commission has had in its power the regulation of rates of water carriers when they are joint rates between railroads and water carriers. So, as a matter of fact, the Interstate Commerce Commission today is far more familiar with the regulation of rates of water carriers than the Maritime Commission can be, because the Interstate Commerce Commission has studied the question for years, and the Maritime Commission has just been appointed. The Maritime Commission has no staff comparable with that of the Interstate Commerce Commission to do the work or to understand the problem with reference to the regulation of water rates.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. Eastman continues:

As a matter of fact, I do not personally anticipate that the regu lation of water carriers will be of any great benefit to the railroads.

Fourth, if there were need for such codification, a public body should do the work and make a report of what it has done before the matter comes up for consideration. * * *

I mean a public body as distinguished from a committee of rail-road executives, railroad employees, a body that looks at this matter from the standpoint of the public interest and then makes a report in which it shows just what it has done, what it proposes to do, and what the reasons are. * * *

you are going to undertake such an important job as the codification of the Interstate Commerce Act, I think, as a matter of procedure, the initial work should be done by a body representing the public and that that body should make a report which will disclose what it has done and the reasons for it, so that those who are directly interested and concerned can have full notice of what is being proposed, instead of being asked in the middle of a session to consider, without any such report, a bill of 183 pages, or two-hundred-odd pages, such as the bill before the House, and be asked to look that through and to find out, at their peril, in what way it may affect them. I do not believe that is proper procedure.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. REED. I wish to say to the Senator from Minnesota that I share the same view as that of Commissioner Eastman, who is regarded as the foremost transportation authority in the country, as to the advisability of attempting a codification of the transportation laws in the way it was done, not that they did not need codification, for any group of laws that have accumulated over a period of 50 or 60 years can generally be improved and simplified by codification. However, I wish to call the attention of the distinguished Senator from Minnesota to the fact that this bill has been carefully gone over, and every part of it reconciled with every other part to the extent that, so far as I am concerned, the measure is free from any objection to the effect that it would work any detriment by its attempt to systematize and codify the transportation laws. If Mr. Eastman were making a statement on the floor of the Senate today as to this bill, I think he would make the same statement that I am now

It would have simplified the work of the Committee on Interstate Commerce tremendously if we could have gone forward with what amendments were necessary in part I of the Railroad Act, in part II of the Motor Vehicle Act, and added a part III covering water regulation, because I thoroughly believe that the only way we can bring about a uniform system of regulation is to provide also for the regulation of water carriers.

The point, however, I desire to make to the Senator from Minnesota is that I share the views of Mr. Eastman. I made the objection, and it was upon my insistence that a voluminous comparative statement was prepared of the present law and all of the changes that were proposed to be made in the present law. That statement has been checked and rechecked, and double checked, I do not know whether I should say 10, 15, 20, or 25 times. We went over it again last night. The Interstate Commerce Commission has checked over this bill. So I say to the Senator from Minnesota, sympathizing with his view and sympathizing with the views of Mr. Eastman as to the wisdom of the approach to this question, that the committee in its work has removed any valid objection that might have arisen if we had not performed long, tiresome, tedious, and painstaking work, with the assistance of Mr. Eastman and the Interstate Commerce Commission. It was a stupid thing on the part of the railroads and their present advisers to approach this question in the way they did; but, nevertheless, we are dealing today with an accomplished fact. We are presenting a bill to this body which, in my judgment, after a lifetime of experience with this question, is free from any valid objection on the point suggested.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. May I ask the Senator from Kansas a question?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it or is it not the Senator's view that the enactment of this bill, when it is put into operation, will raise the rates on water-borne traffic?

Mr. REED. No; I do not think so.

Mr. CONNALLY. Then, what good will it do to the rail-

Mr. REED. I may say to the Senator from Texas that I have repeatedly stated that I doubt very much whether the railroads would obtain any appreciable benefit so far as the regulation of water traffic is concerned. That, however, is not the question.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me ask one further question. If the passage of the bill will not result in raising the rates on water-borne traffic, and, therefore, will not help the railroads to any extent, why put water transportation into the bill?

Mr. REED. Because, I may say to the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Minnesota, that, after struggling with this question for 3 months-

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator; I think he has no doubt struggled with it, and the committee has struggled with it, and I think they are entitled to a great deal of credit for the work they have done, but, when they ended their struggling, what is the result? Unless the bill will raise the rates on water-borne transportation, what good can the railroads get out of it; and if it will not result in raising the rates on water-borne transportation, what is the use of bringing the water carriers into the bill?

Mr. REED. As I understood the Senator from Texas, he reached the point where he wanted to know about the regulation of water rates. I wish to say to the Senator that of all the water carriers that have been before the committee and that have been in conference with the committee or the subcommittee or that have come to see us individually or by committees, a majority of the water carriers in the intercoastal trade and the largest carriers on the Mississippi River system have desired regulation.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I know that, and I think I know the reason. They want to get higher rates and to obtain a monopoly. They want for prospective carriers certificates of convenience and necessity, to be passed upon by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and under that provision they hope to come before the Commission and say, "There is no need for anybody to compete with us. We are giving the public service; we can handle the business; we should like to have it all."

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question on that point?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield. Mr. OVERTON. Are they not the same water carriers who are relieved, under the provisions of this bill, from the necessity of obtaining a certificate of convenience and necessity?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Of course, they are already operating and they do not need such a certificate.

Mr. OVERTON. They are already operating.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, with reference to the water carriers, let me call attention to the Federal Barge Lines. Certainly the Federal Barge Lines are not a monopoly. They have come here at every session of the Congress when we have had the long-and-short-haul provision before the committee and violently protested against certain proposed legislation which they felt would be detrimental to the shipping interests. I have a letter, received today, that was voluntarily written to me from New Orleans by Mr. L. D. Chaffee, general traffic manager of the Federal Barge Lines. I do not even know Mr. Chaffee; but he says:

Enactment into law of your bill to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, S. 2009, will be a long step toward the solution of the transportation problem.

Then he goes on to point out some of the problems on the Mississippi River, and he says that, in his judgment, the Interstate Commerce Commission, if it is given the power, will rectify some of the conditions.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. What are the problems which he wants solved and which he thinks the Commission can solve?

Mr. WHEELER. I will read further from his letter:

Enactment into law of your bill to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, S. 2009, will be a long step toward the solution of the transportation problem—

And so forth.

Common carriers on the Mississippi River and its tributaries have Common carriers on the Mississippi River and its tributaries have not been responsible for the havoc wrought in the rate structure of the country. Contract carriers have generally been the first to establish subnormal rates. They have been able to do this where traffic is available at a point on the water front for delivery at a distant point also on the water front, including in their rates no charge for terminal services. I find nothing in the bill which would be applied the charge for terminal services. prevent the charter to industries of contract carrier, towboats, and barres to carry on as a private operation the business now conducted on a contract basis. If rail carriers and common carriers by water are to continue to serve "off-bank" industries and keep them on a fairly competitive relationship with "on-bank" industries, their rates cannot be increased.

He says "their rates cannot be increased," and continues:

However, I know of no better way of developing the subject than to enact your bill into law. It will be the responsibility of the Board of Investigation and Research and of the Interstate Commerce Commission to discover weaknesses in the act and to recommend appropriate legislation to overcome them.

I sincerely hope that at least one Interstate Commerce Commissioner, preferably Commissioner Eastman, may be selected by the President to head the Board if the act becomes a law.

With best wishes for the success of your bill,

Sincerely yours,

L. D. CHAFFEE.

The Senator from Louisiana probably knows Mr. Chaffee; I do not know him.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I do not question Mr. Chaffee's motives, nor do I question his ability, for I know that many people along the Mississippi River are anxious to have the barge line developed and, perhaps, to have a monopoly; so they would like to have regulation. The barge line does not need a certificate of necessity and convenience; they are already operating, and, with the development of a 9-foot channel nearing completion, they can look forward to prospects of an enormous commerce being developed which cannot move now even by rail because of the high rates. I do not want to question the motives of Mr. Chaffee; I do not know him; but his opinion, in my judgment, is not any better than that of anyone else. However, the waterways should be used for the benefit of the general public and to aid commerce over this vast continent by keeping commerce moving at the lowest possible cost in order to facilitate an increase of commerce and an increase of employment, because, with an increase of commerce there must be an increase of manufactures and of employment.

Mr. President, we have here-and I shall close in just a few moments-developed two outlets, one to the east and the other the south, making it possible to transport goods by water from the interior here [indicating on map] of a landlocked country to every port in the world. In central Europe, where they have spent more money on waterways than we have, all the industries are gathered along the river fronts in order that their product may be carried down to the sea; and the railroads and waterways of course carry freight to and from the waterways.

Long years ago, when the waterways in central Europe were developed, goods could be shipped from central Europe down to the sea, across the Atlantic, and landed in San Francisco or Seattle cheaper than they could be sent by rail from Pittsburgh. To show you that there cannot possibly be any competition between railroads and waterways because of the inherently lower cost of transportation on the waterways, let me point out that in 1934 we had to have a million and a half bushels of wheat brought from Portland, Oreg., and Seattle, Wash., to be used for seed in the drought area. The distance across the country to Chicago and Duluth is 1,500 miles; but the rates were so high that the wheat was loaded on bulk freighters, hauled down through the Panama Canal. up the Atlantic coast, and up the Hudson River to Albany, transshipped to a barge, shipped to Buffalo, again transshipped to a boat, and taken all the way to Chicago and Duluth, 8,500 miles, cheaper than it could have been shipped 1,500 miles across the country.

The Interstate Commerce Commission has held for years, time and time again, that there is no inherent possibility of competition between rail and water, because the cost of transportation by water is inherently so much lower that one method cannot compete with the other.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Brown in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I do.

Mr. CONNALLY. If some freight in New York were to be shipped to San Francisco, would the Interstate Commerce Commission make the same rate by water as by rail? Would that be fair?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I think it would destroy a great deal of our commerce.

Mr. CONNALLY. The point I am getting at is this: Water transportation is slow, and takes a great deal of time. Is not the man who puts up with the delay, and all that, rather than to ship by rail, entitled to some reduction in the rate?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Why, of course.

Mr. CONNALLY. Then would any commission, if it was fair and just and acted in the public interest, make the same rate on a shipment of goods from New York to San Francisco by water and by rail?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. No; I do not think so. There are, of course, some goods that are so heavy and bulky that they cannot go by rail at all.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. ELLENDER. What is there in the bill to prevent the Commission from fixing the rate by water the same as by rail?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I do not see anything of that kind in the bill. There was at one time something in the bill that led me to believe there might be a possibility that the Commission would have to fix the rates at different levels; but as the bill has now been amended I do not see that there is any ground for believing that the Interstate Commerce Commission cannot make the rates by water as high as by rail. I am not saying that they will do so, but, in my opinion, there is nothing in the bill now to prevent it.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. ELLENDER. It has been stated on several occasions that the Commission has not only the right but the duty of making that differential. I should like to have the author of the bill now show us that language.

Mr. WHEELER. It is in three different places.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If the Senator will pardon me, I should like to finish. I shall finish in a few minutes, and then I shall yield the floor.

I am not going to ask now for consideration of the amendment I have on the desk. I anticipate that the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Balley] will come first. If that fails, I shall offer the amendment.

The members of the committee who have been with me in this matter have worked harder on this bill than I have. I refer to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN], the Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler], and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED]. I have the highest regard for their friendship and their good intentions. I desire again to state to them that I very much regret that I cannot agree with them on the general policy of this bill. We have different points of view. I am sorry that is so. I am simply thinking in the interest of the general public, whereas the sponsors of the bill seems to have claimed right along that the purpose of the bill is to help the railroads. I wish it would help the railroads. We know that the railroads need help; but they are in no worse condition than other industries in the country and other people in the country. One-third of the farmers of the United States have been sold out by mortgage foreclosure in the past 10 years, but I have not heard of a single railroad that has been sold to the highest bidder in foreclosure proceedings.

I yield the floor.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent—and I may state that I have taken up the matter with the managers of the bill—for the consideration at this time of an amendment which I have submitted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, let me say that the amendment which the Senator has suggested is to repeal the provision cutting down the time within which certain claims by a railroad or against a railroad must be filed. The Commission recommended that the time be 6 months. We put it in, I think, at 9 months. Some persons who appeared before the committee felt that that time ought to be extended. We worked it out and made it 18 months; and all those who appeared before the committee said they were satisfied with 18 months. Everyone said that 18 months would give full and ample opportunity.

The Commission for years has recommended that the time be reduced to 6 months. We compromised and put it at 18 months, and I am sure that is ample time.

I appreciate the fact that there are some lawyers who dig up old claims against the railroads within a period of 3 years. They have attempted to stir up litigation, and they feel that they would like to have 3 years instead of 18 months for the purpose. They have written to some of the shippers and suggested that the time should be 3 years; but, so far as the shippers are concerned, 18 months is ample time, and I am sure the Senator's constituents will find it satisfactory.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, is not the present law 3 years?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; and the Commission felt that it has not worked satisfactorily to have it 3 years; that it has been a great burden to them, and it has not done the shippers or anybody else any good. It was not on the recommendation of the railroads or the railroad brotherhoods, but solely on the recommendation of the Interstate Comerce Commission, which has had to administer the law, that this change was proposed by the committee.

Mr. DANAHER. I know nothing of any lawyers who may or may not have claims with reference to overcharges. I do know that in New England, from which obviously shipments which are transcontinental must be rerouted and must be reshipped over other lines, there are necessarily conflicts with reference to rate charges. At New Haven or Providence or Boston the New Haven Railroad, for instance, will pick up a car or a dozen cars, for that matter, and they may pass over half a dozen lines before they reach their destination. The immediate shipper necessarily takes 6, 7, or 8 months at home for his home audit; and when his audit has been completed he sends the matter on to his traffic manager. Most shippers are not able to have traffic managers of their own. They have a traffic bureau through which they deal; and when the audit report is submitted there, and the matter is taken up with the line, several additional months elapse before they ascertain whether or not there is an overcharge.

The law has had that condition in contemplation. The law still provides a 3-year maximum period within which to file claims. I think it is a fair statement that since this particular bill reaches so far, and makes such substantial changes, and will bring so many groups of shippers under the aegis of the Interstate Commerce Commission, far from restricting the right, we ought very properly to continue it until we ascertain the experience under the bill.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator that so far as I am personally concerned I am not very familiar with the subject, because I have not had any dealings at all with it; but lawyers who appeared before the committee in Washington, and who had represented shippers, stated their views, and were satisfied with it.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. Reed] has had a great deal to do with this particular subject. I should like to have him explain the matter to the Senator.

Mr. DANAHER. I gladly yield for the purpose of such an explanation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I appreciate the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut. I, myself, have had a number of letters on this subject from shippers, freight claim bureaus, auditors, and so forth.

The situation is this:

Under the law, for a good many years a 3-year period was allowed to the railroads in which to file a suit, if a suit is necessary, against a shipper when there has been an undercharge. A 3-year period was allowed the shipper in which to file a suit, if a suit was necessary, when there was an overcharge. When damages were incurred, the period was 2 years; and in one other respect, I think—I have forgotten what it was—there was a 1-year limitation.

Several times the Interstate Commerce Commission have made recommendations on this subject in about 4 different ways. At one time they wanted to cut down the time to 90 days, I think. Another time it was 6 months. When this bill was written originally, 1 year was put in.

This is a subject with which I have had a very large amount of experience.

On behalf of shippers I have prosecuted claims against the railroad companies for overcharges and for damages. Naturally, there is on the part of some a desire for a long period, looking at the matter from one standpoint, and particularly the standpoint of a great auditing bureau, which wants all the time it can get. Some would take 7 years, if they could get that much time, as the period during which they could keep a claim alive. When this bill was under consideration in the hearings I asked every shipper's representative who appeared about the time limitation. Those who objected to the fixing of a year had some valid ground, because a number of shippers desire to keep their freight bills in their files for a year for auditing and for tax purposes.

I thought the period of a year was too short, but I asked the question of every shipper's representative who appeared—and I have also had some correspondence on the subject—whether or not an 18-month period would be satisfactory, and the answer has always been in the affirmative. It is my own mature judgment, out of a great deal of experience with this particular question, that an 18-month period is a period fair to both sides. It permits a shipper to keep his freight bills for a year, if he desires, and 6 months in which he can have them audited by some firm which makes a speciality of auditing.

I beg the Senator from Connecticut and the Senate to bear this in mind, too. The proposed law does not require that the controversy be settled and the issue determined within 18 months. That is only the limitation of time for the filing of a claim, and every freight auditing bureau in this country—and there are many people in the legitimate business, and there are many chiselers in the business—knows that if at the end of 17 months and 20 days there were any doubt, all they would have to do would be to write a letter to the Interstate Commerce Commission setting out the fact, and that letter would constitute an informal complaint, which would stay the running of the statute of limitation.

It is my statement to the Senate, out of long experience, and with due deference to the able Senator from Connecticut, that an 18 months' period is fair to all parties involved.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield that I may ask a question of the Senator from Montana?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Many of us have not had an opportunity to study in detail this very important bill. It is one of the bills in the consideration of which we have to rely a good deal upon the judgment of the committee, who we rightly assume in this particular subject have been concerned especially about the general public interest.

Before I propound the question I wish to ask, I should like to add my personal word of commendation for the long and arduous public service the Senator from Montana has performed in listening to the evidence, studying this complex problem, and putting the bill into shape for action by the Congress.

Mr. WHEELER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to know for the Record whether the report on the pending measure submitted by the Interstate Commerce Committee meets with the unanimous or practically unanimous approval of the committee.

Mr. WHEELER. The committee was unanimous, with the exception of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Shipstead].

Mr. WALSH. How many members are there on the committee?

Mr. WHEELER. Twenty-one.

Mr. WALSH. What is the opinion or judgment of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the wisdom of the proposed legislation?

Mr. WHEELER. Commissioner Eastman has gone on record as favoring the general objectives of the bill, and the Interstate Commerce Commission has repeatedly recommended that the regulation of rates of water carriers be brought under the Interstate Commerce Commission in order to make rates uniform.

Mr. WALSH. So far as the Senator knows, there is no serious objection by any member of the Interstate Commerce Commission to any of the provisions of the bill?

Mr. WHEELER. None that I know of.

Mr. WALSH. What is the position of the railroads of the country with respect to the proposed legislation?

Mr. WHEELER. With reference to a few of the provisions of the bill—for instance, the provision concerning through routes—they have objected, but generally they are in favor of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. What is the position of the railroad brother-hoods?

Mr. WHEELER. They are 100 percent for it.

Mr. WALSH. Assuming, as I stated, that the members of the committee, under the able leadership of the Senator from Montana, have been concerned about the public interest, I am disposed to vote for the bill.

Mr. WHEELER. I may say further to the Senator that the truck and bus interests, who at the outset were opposed, since we have adopted amendments which we thought were fair to them have indicated that they favor the bill. Likewise a majority of the water carriers engaged in intercoastal business are in favor of it. I received a telegram, which was sent this morning to a New England Senator from Boston, from an institution in New England, stating that they had had some objection to the bill, but as amended they felt it was a good bill, and that they were in favor of it.

Mr. WALSH. I may add that I have received no communications indicating any general criticism of the bill. There have been some suggestions in reference to certain features of the measure, and many of them have been discussed on the floor, including the one the Senator from Kansas has just explained, but I am impressed with the fact that I have received no general criticism from those deeply and vitally interested in the subject covered by the bill. I thank the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator from Montana spoke of a communication from a Massachusetts institute. Was not that the Maritime Association of the Port of Boston?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. REED. Let me suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that during the progress of the consideration of the bill I have had a number of conferences with the Interstate Commerce Commission, as represented by its legislative committee, or a special committee, in which we have discussed nearly all phases of the bill. There is in the bill one thing the Interstate Commerce Commission very strongly desires. It has sought for some years to secure legislation which would simplify its procedure and save time. Among the most valuable provisions in the bill is that which permits the Interstate Commerce Commission so to organize itself that it may expedite its business. That provision was worked out by myself in conjunction with the committee representing the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I do not mean to say that every member of the Interstate Commerce Commission agrees in every degree and every respect, but I think the bill, taking it by and large, has the approval of a majority of the Commission.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I wish to extend the compliment I paid to the Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler] to the Senator from Kansas also.

I was pleased to hear the Senator's gracious and generous reference to Mr. Eastman. I may say to my colleagues that I take just pride in having discovered Mr. Eastman. When I was Governor of Massachusetts I made him one of the public service commissioners of the State, and it was in that office that he began his brilliant career of public service.

Mr. REED. I can only emphasize that statement. Mr. Eastman happens to be one of my warm personal friends, growing out of 20 years of contact with him on the commission. I regard him as the foremost transportation statesman and authority in the United States, and a more devoted public servant does not live in this country than Joseph Bartlett Eastman.

Mr. WALSH. I am gratified to hear that.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me so that I may ask the Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler] a few questions pertaining to the pending bill?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. Will the Senator from Montana point out the language in the bill which will give authority to the Interstate Commerce Commission to establish different rates on water transportation in contrast with railroad transportation?

Mr. WHEELER. First, there is the declaration of policy, beginning on page 1, as follows:

It is hereby declared to be the national transportation policy of the Congress to provide for fair and impartial regulation of all modes of transportation subject to the provisions of this act, so administered as to recognize and preserve the inherent advantages

Mr. ELLENDER. What is the interpretation of the Senator of the phrase "inherent advantages of each"?

Mr. WHEELER. I received a letter this morning from an attorney for some of the shippers of the country. Someone made a suggestion that the word "inherent" should be changed, and speaking of that this correspondent says that he believes the word "inherent" is the very broadest term which could be used in protecting the shipping interests, and that they want that word in the bill.

When the bill speaks of inherent advantages of the shipping interests, it refers to carriers which can transport at a cheaper rate because they can ship by water, by way of canals and the ocean, so they have natural advantages, and they do not have the expense of the upkeep of the rights-ofway, as railroads do.

Mr. ELLENDER. In view of that explanation, why did the committee agree to exempt transportation on the Great Lakes from the bill?

Mr. WHEELER. We did not make any different exemption with reference to them than we made with reference to the barge lines. We recognized, and everyone recognizes, that there are certain forms of transportation, such as the carrying of coal, and the carrying of certain other things. which in nowise come in competition with any other form of transportation. So we inserted a provision in the bill that such contract carriers could, by making application to the Interstate Commerce Commission, be exempted where they showed they were engaged in a form of transportation which did not compete.

Mr. ELLENDER. Was that the reason assigned by which the Great Lakes were exempted?

Mr. WHEELER. No; that was the general attitude. We drew the provision in general terms. Specifically, with reference to the Great Lakes, they had a problem which was entirely different from the rest, for the reason that on the Great Lakes in certain instances they come in competition with foreign trade, with which the intercoastal traffic does not come into competition. So we said to them, "Because there is no way in which the Government of the United States can regulate foreign shipping, to the extent that you come in competition with the foreign trade of Canada you are exempt."

Mr. ELLENDER. Why would not that same argument apply with respect to freight on the Mississippi River, let us say, in which I am very much interested?

Mr. WHEELER. There is no foreign competition there. Mr. ELLENDER. Why not? There are barges and ships transporting foreign commerce up the Mississippi River.

Mr. WHEELER. If that commerce goes up the river by barge line it would be subject to regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Canadian traffic would

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. ELLENDER. I yield, although I have not the floor. The Senator from Connecticut has graciously yielded to me so that I might question the Senator from Montana.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. There will be nothing to bar the Interstate Commerce Commission from regulating American vessels going from one American port to another American port, will there? The Commission could regulate them, could it not?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; it could.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. But now they are not regulated.

Mr. WHEELER. We do regulate them.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The common carriers on the Great Lakes?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And private carriers?

Mr. WHEELER. Which does the Senator have reference to? Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have reference particularly to private carriers and common carriers.

Mr. WHEELER. I have tried to make it plain to the Senate, not once but 50 times, that, as a matter of fact, there is nothing in the bill which seeks to regulate private carriers, because, in my judgment-and some members of the committee have disagreed with me-Congress does not possess the power to do so. If I owned a boat, for instance, and I was carrying my own cargo in it, and the Government said that I had to pay such and such charges for the freight that I carried for myself, it would simply result in my taking money out of one pocket and putting it into the other.

There is only one way to get at the barge line, as I have repeatedly said. We have deepened the channel in the Ohio, and we have deepened the channel in the Mississippi-

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Let us finish with the first proposition. Mr. WHEELER. Let me finish my statement. We deepened those channels, and the only way the barge traffic can be regulated is by putting a toll on it. If Congress believes that is the thing it wants to do, it can make the barge lines pay, and thus help to pay for building those channels of transportation. However, we cannot regulate those rates. It is impracticable. It is impossible.

With reference to the contract carriers on the Great Lakes, where they are not in competition with the foreign trade, under the provisions of the bill they would be in exactly the same position as they are in connection with the intercoastal transportation and with every other form of transportation. Where they compete in the foreign trade we exempted them for the same reason that we have exempted the shipping from foreign ports coming into the United States. We cannot regulate foreign commerce, so we did not seek to regulate those who come in competition with it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator from Louisiana asked me a question. I do not have the floor.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, one more question-does the Senator from Montana think the language in the bill broad enough to exempt foreign commerce which is brought. let us say, up the Mississippi River?

Mr. WHEELER. No; not if it is brought up the Mississippi River. Foreign commerce which goes up the Mississippi River and stops at a port would be subject to regulation, as I understand.

Mr. ELLENDER. If that is true, then I ask the question. Why does not the same yardstick apply to the Great Lakes?

Mr. WHEELER. Because of the fact that the foreign commerce coming up the Mississippi River can be regulated under the law. That presents an entirely different situation. But you cannot regulate the foreign commerce coming from Canada on the Great Lakes.

Mr. ELLENDER. I cannot understand why. What difference should it make if the foreign commerce comes from Canada or from some South American country?

Mr. CONNALLY. It is traffic between Canadian ports. Mr. WHEELER. Yes; it is between Canadian ports. What the American shippers on the Great Lakes want to do is to go into Canadian ports and compete with the Candians in their own ports, and we cannot regulate that kind of traffic. We could regulate the American, but we cannot regulate the Canadian. The American shipping man says, "I want to compete with the Canadian in his own port and I cannot compete with him unless he is regulated." So an entirely different situation is presented.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. We can regulate an American boat engaged in transportation from Duluth to Buffalo, between American ports. But can we regulate an American boat plying between ports in Canada?

Mr. WHEELER. We can regulate the rates on the American ships if we wanted to any place in the world.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is what I thought.

Mr. WHEELER. But we are not doing it because of the fact that the shipowner wants to compete with ships which go from Canadian ports-

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. To American ports? Mr. WHEELER. No; to Canadian ports.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. But with respect to American boats going from an American port to an American port we have a right to regulate and we can regulate them, as I understand.

Mr. WHEELER. We do it to exactly the same extent that we do up the Mississippi River.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is, we can regulate the cargo carriers, the contract carriers?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator know that private carriers carry 75 percent of the total freight by contract?

Mr. WHEELER. Of course I know that, and I have explained that to the Senate, not once but 50 times.

Mr. ELLENDER. Am I to understand that all the traffic on the Great Lakes is not excluded under the provisions of

Mr. WHEELER. Yes. Mr. ELLENDER. The Senator stated there were two other places in the bill to which he wished to refer.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes. The next is the rate-making rule.

Mr. ELLENDER. On what page is that?

Mr. WHEELER. Page 120. That is section 30:

It shall be the duty of the Commission in the exercise of its power-

I ask the Senate to follow the language very carefully-

It shall be the duty of the Commission in the exercise of its power to prescribe just and reasonable rates, to give due consideration, among other factors-

To what?-

to the effect of rates on the movement of traffic by the carrier or carriers for which the rates are prescribed; to the need, in the public interest, of adequate and efficient transportation service by such carrier or carriers at the lowest cost consistent with the furnishing of such service; and to the need of revenues sufficient to enable such carrier-

Not the railroads-or carriers-

Which it regulates-under honest, economical, and efficient management, to provide such service. When used in this section the term "rates" means "rates, service. and charges, and all regulations and practices relating

Mr. ELLENDER. There is no specific language in section 30, to which the Senator has just referred, except that it is to apply to all carriers alike, whether water or rail?

Mr. WHEELER. No; that is the specific thing we do not do. I ask the Senator to read the language carefully. I am sure the Senator is a good lawyer, and I have a great deal of respect for him; but if he will read that language carefully, he will see-what?-

It shall be the duty of the Commission, in the exercise of its power to prescribe just and reasonable rates, to give due consideramong other factors, to the effect of rates on the movement

By whom? Not by the railroads, but-by the carrier or carriers for which the rates are prescribed.

In other words, if they are fixing the rate for a water carrier, then they must consider the effect on the movement of the traffic of that particular carrier, and if the rate is raised out of proportion, whether or not that carrier would be able to get the business. Then we say:

To the need, in the public interest, of adequate and efficient transportation service-

By whom? Not by the railroads, not by the trucks, but by the water carrier, if that is the one whose rates they are considering.

Mr. ELLENDER. But they are all carriers.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course they are all carriers. But we are talking about what? The water carrier comes before the Commission and says, "I wish to reduce my rate." The railroad is not in that picture at all. And the bus and the truck people are not in that picture. The water carriers are applying to the Commission for permission to reduce their rates. We say it is the duty of the Commission in fixing the rates first to take into consideration the inherent advantages possessed by the water carrier. Secondly, we say to that water carrier that we must take into consideration the effect on the movement of the traffic by the lowering or the raising of that rate which is under consideration by the Commission.

Then we say to the carrier, "You should take into consideration the 'need, in the public interest, of adequate and efficient transportation service' "—of whom? Of the water carrier. And then we say, "At the lowest cost" at which the water carrier can carry it, "consistent with the furnishing of such service; and to the need of revenues sufficient to enable" that water carrier "under honest, economical, and efficient management, to provide such service."

Mr. ELLENDER. In passing upon "adequate and efficient transportation service" will not the Commission have to compare the service of one carrier with that of another?

Mr. WHEELER. Not at all. When the matter came before the committee it did not contain the language which is now in the bill, but the committee took it up with Mr. Eastman and the Commission. We wanted to make it doubly sure that the thing the Senator is afraid of, and that some other people have been afraid of, would not happen; so the committee took the matter up with the Commission and the experts of the Commission, and with Mr. Eastman, and he suggested this particular language because it would have the effect of protecting and doubly protecting against the very thing the Senator has referred to.

Mr. ELLENDER. I am a little fearful of the bill because I understand that the railroads would not be interested in this legislation unless the water carriers are included. What has the Senator to say with respect to that statement?

Mr. WHEELER. I will say to the Senator that that is not correct. There has been more misinformation about this piece of legislation, from people who do not know anything about it or what it contains, than I have known in connection with any piece of legislation with which I have had anything to do in Congress. There are some "chiselers" among the water carriers. The great majority of the water carriers are in favor of the bill.

Mr. ELLENDER. Not the inland water carriers.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, yes. Earlier in the day I called attention to a letter from Mr. Chaffee, of New Orleans, who is connected with the Government-owned barge line. Mr. Chaffee wrote me a letter which I put in the RECORD today, stating that he was in favor of the bill and pointing out how he thought it would be of great service to the inland water carriers on the Mississippi River. Mr. Ames, representing the Mississippi Valley Barge Line, is in favor of the bill.

Mr. ELLENDER. Whom does Mr. Chaffee represent?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chaffee represents the Inland Waterways Corporation.

Mr. ELLENDER. Is it Mr. Chaffee, the lawyer?

Mr. WHEELER. He is the traffic manager, located in New Orleans. I received a letter from him this morning. I do not even know the gentleman.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. In that connection it is only fair to state that my colleague [Mr. ELLENDER] and myself have received innumerable letters from the port of New Orleans against the bill, and that Mr. Chaffee does not represent the vast majority of the people in the port of New Orleans.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. OVERTON. I wish to make that contribution. Mr. WHEELER. I will say to the Senator that General Ashburn came before the committee and testified in favor of the bill. In every hearing before the Interstate Commerce Committee in which the question of water carriers has been under consideration, General Ashburn has taken a position against doing anything which would in the slightest degree harm the water carriers.

Representatives of many of the water carriers came before the committee in favor of the bill. It is true that the American Merchant Marine Institute, through its lawyer, Judge Burns, appeared before the committee and testified against it. I know Judge Burns. He is a very good friend of mine, and a very high-class man. However, when I asked him whom the institute represented, he testified that the institute represented the great bulk of the shippers of the country, most of whom were engaged in foreign shipping. The only intercoastal shippers who belong to his organization are those which are controlled by the oil and steel interests. It should be remembered that Judge Burns was formerly special counsel for the Maritime Commission, and after that employment he became attorney for the American Merchant Marine Institute. That is nothing to his discredit, but I call attention to the fact.

Those who appeared in opposition to the bill were asking for money out of the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of being subsidized by the Government of the United

We have heard much about the Maritime Commission and Admiral Land. I read his statement. It contains many inaccuracies. It shows conclusively that he does not know what is in the bill, and that whoever advised him and gave him the information has not given any study to the legislation. He talks about the Maritime Commission being in a better position to regulate water transportation than is the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Stop for a moment and think of the position of the Maritime Commission. At the present time it owns and operates the so-called Dollar Line. Today the statement was made that the railroads of the country had been subsidized by receiving land grants. That was true a great many years ago. Perhaps it was not wise, but there was probably no other way in which the Northern Pacific and some of the transcontinental railroads could have been built than through land grants at that time. Land grants were made by the Congress of the United States, wisely or unwisely, because it was felt desirable to develop the great Northwest and the western part of the country.

I hold no brief for the railroads. As a matter of fact, I have probably been one of the most severe critics in the Senate of the railroads and their practices. For the past 2 years we have held hearings and have gone into the financial transactions of the railroads. We have made recommendations and reports. We shall make several further reports which will condemn the railroads in unmistakable terms for some of the practices in which they have indulged.

However, regardless of the practices of the past, when we talk about subsidies for the railroads and subsidies for the ships, and when we talk about the Maritime Commission's regulating the shipping industry of the country, of course, if I were receiving a subsidy from the Government of the United States I should like to be regulated by the same agency which was giving me the subsidy. If I were owned by that agency, of course I should want to have my rates regulated by that agency. The Maritime Commission is passing out money. We had scandals in connection with the United States Shipping Board when we were lending them money. Such scandals were a disgrace to the Government of the United States. If we are not careful, we shall experience the same kind of scandals in connection with the Maritime Commission. The Maritime Commission is pouring out money at this time in connection with certain meetings. The Dollar Line, with Government money, is holding dinners at $10 a plate in San Francisco, Chicago, Baltimore, and all over the country.

Mr. ELLENDER. Has the Senator proof of the fact that Government money is being used?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes. Mr. ELLENDER. I should like to have the Senator produce the proof.

Mr. WHEELER. I can produce it.

Mr. ELLENDER. I should like to have the Senator produce the proof that Government money is being used to provide banquets at $10 a plate.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. ELLENDER. Will the Senator produce such evidence. I repeat?

Mr. WHEELER. One such dinner was held in San Francisco. I am informed one was held in Baltimore, one in Chicago, and one in New York. I do not know whether they were held in other cities or not. I called Admiral Land's attention to the matter the other night, and said to him that I did not think the Congress of the United States would ever stand for such a thing if it knew about it. I knew about it. It was called to my attention in San Francisco. Socalled shippers and politicians were called into a big meeting. A great reception and dinner were given at the expense of the Government of the United States.

Mr. ELLENDER. If the Senator has such information he has a wonderful opportunity to ventilate it before the Senate so that the country may be informed.

Mr. WHEELER. I think I am now ventilating it.

Mr. ELLENDER. Not merely by asserting it. What I want is facts. Such statements as are now being made by the Senator are frequently stated without any support. I have heard allegations on many occasions from the Senator, but no proof in support of them.

Mr. WHEELER. Do not take my word for it. Ask the Commission. Shippers have come to me and said that they do not want to be regulated by the Maritime Commission, but they do not dare to come out and testify. The representative of the American Merchant Marine Institute came before the committee and testified against the bill. Of course, the institute is against the bill because, on the one hand, it is receiving money from the Commission to subsidize its ships. Some of the ships are operated in the intercoastal traffic. As I understand, the only members of the institute which operate in the intercoastal trade are the oil and steel companies. They do not want this bill because of the fact that they would like to see the channels and canals conducted in such a way that they can reap profits. The other day I read to the Senate the testimony of an oil man from Memphis, Tenn., in which he said, "Certainly we are using water transportation, and we are taking the money that we make on the cheaper transportation for oil and putting it in our pockets." Such persons talk about wanting to do something in the interest of the dear public. Of course, they want to ship by Consider the position of steel. Probably the largest users of steel in the country are the railroads. In what position are they?

The question has been asked, "What would the bill do for the railroads of the country?" Some of those who are hanging around the corridors and talking about the public interest say, "We represent 400,000 farmers." They do not represent a single farmer. Certain witnesses said they were representing the Farmers' Union. I telegraphed to the Farmers' Union in my State and inquired whether or not these particular witnesses were representing the Farmers' Union in that State, and the reply was that they were not. I then took the matter up with the national organization, and received a letter from the national organization saying that those witnesses were not representing the national association.

Whom are they representing? Are they representing steel or oil interests? Who is paying their expenses to come to Washington and lobby in the interest of the "public" and in the interest of the "farmers"?

Mr. President, when we talk about the public interest, what do we find? The minute a railroad has to reduce its rates along the Mississippi River or somewhere else to compete with the water carriers, the water carriers come to the Commission and protest against the lowering of transcontinental rail rates or rail rates along the Mississippi River because "You are going to put us out of business." They want to keep the railroads in a strait jacket with regulation, but they themselves do not want to be regulated.

Can anyone stand before the Congress of the United States and say one group of transportation should be regulated and another group should not be regulated?

Mr. ELLENDER. That is not my position at all. Mr. WHEELER. I understand that.

Mr. ELLENDER. But I desire to point out to the Senate that I do not think it wise to place in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission, a body created to deal with railroad rates, the right to fix water transportation rates.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the Senator allow me to finish my statement? Then I will be glad to yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask again, is there anyone who can come before the Congress and say that one group of carriers should be held in a strait jacket and another group should be free, and that those who are free should then be able to protest when the regulated carriers desired to reduce their "Oh, no," they say; "we do not want to be regulated, because that would not be in the public interest." If it is not in the public interest to regulate their boats so that they may be in a position to cut their rates, then it is certainly in the interest of the public to take away regulation imposed on the railroads so that they may cut their rates to meet water competition.

Mr. ELLENDER. I do not think that is the essential difference. We in the South have been fighting a very long time for justice in the matter of railroad rates.

Mr. WHEELER. I agree with the Senator's statement.

Mr. ELLENDER. As the Senator well knows, we are not treated as we ought to be. There is no reason for the discrimination in rates that now exist.

Mr. WHEELER. No; but the South is in no different position than the West, or perhaps New England.

Mr. ELLENDER. I understand that; but just to give an instance, I live in the town of Houma, located in southern Louisiana. It has but one railroad, the Southern Pacific. North of Houma there is a town named Thibodaux, through which runs two railroads, the Texas-Pacific and the Southern Pacific. Prior to the time when the Intercoastal Canal was built through my home town, a carload lot of ammunition could be shipped from Delaware for two-hundred-and-someodd dollars cheaper per car to Thibodaux than to Houma, and such ammunition could be unloaded in Thibodaux and trucked to Houma, a distance of 15 miles, at a saving of over $100 a car. Since the building of the said canal, Houma is on a par with Thibodaux insofar as freight rates are concerned.

Mr. WHEELER. I think there have probably been many instances of that kind.

Mr. ELLENDER. Personally, I am not against regulation. but I fear if the same Interstate Commerce Commission, organized to fix railroad rates, is used to regulate rates both on water and on rail, that an effort will be made to equalize those rates. I am wondering what good reason there was for the committee to strike out the provisions with respect to air transportation.

Mr. WHEELER. We struck out the provisions with respect to air transportation, to be frank, because the air lines at the present time carry only one-tenth of 1 percent of the passengers of the country. Some of us were not particularly in favor of eliminating those provisions, but air transportation is a brand-new thing practically.

Some complaint has been made in reference to that subject, and it has been said that it ought to be considered by the Commerce Committee rather than by the Interstate Commerce Committee. Let us see about that. The Interstate Commerce Commission has been regulating almost from the time of its organization up until now through rates or joint rates by water and rail. In 1935 the Congress sought to extend the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission by placing under it the regulation of water carriers.

While that was happening, and while that bill was pending, a measure was introduced at the instance of the shippers to set up a Maritime Commission, because they wanted subsidies, as they always want subsidies, from the Public Treasury. They were getting subsidies at one time in the form of the use of public money at as low a rate as one-eighth of 1 percent. So when scandal arose in the United States Shipping Board and it was exposed on the floor of the Senate and we repealed the act providing for the Shipping Board, those interested did not stop working, but they came back to Congress time and time again and said, "In the interest of the defense of the country we have got to have a merchant marine." So they stirred the patriotic feelings of Members of Congress and another Commission was established. We did not call it the United States Shipping Board but the Maritime Commission, because that sounded better, but it is the same kind of board which was abolished a few years ago and is giving the same kind of subsidies.

Then we provided that that Commission should regulate those whom they were subsidizing. The independent carrier said. "I do not want to be regulated; I own my own boats; I am not being subsidized, and I do not want to be regulated by a Commission that is subsidizing others."

Mr. ELLENDER. Would the Senator be willing to have the Maritime Commission regulate the water rates provided we exclude the subsidized carriers to which he refers?

Mr. WHEELER. The Maritime Commission has other things to do. It operates the shipping companies; it operates, for instance, the Dollar Line, which goes around the world. Secondly, it subsidizes other shipping, and, in addition to that, it regulates boats. I say that the regulation of transportation, whether by air or by water or by rail, if we desire to have a unified transportation system in this country, ought to be placed in the hands of a commission that stands before the country with never a breath of scandal against it. When people criticize the Interstate Commerce Commission for acts to which reference has been made here. they ought to criticize the Congress.

Now let me return to the subject of air transportation. When that question came up, air transportation was also being regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission. While a measure on the subject was pending before the Interstate Commerce Committee, the then chairman of the Commerce Committee introduced a bill providing for the creation of another body to regulate air transportation. I did not complain, because I do not think the people of the country are interested one hoot in what committee takes jurisdiction of proposed legislation; what they are interested in is results that are accomplished. I may say that the pending bill is not my measure. I merely introduced it. If Senators desire to know, it was at the request of the President of the United States. I introduced it not because I was anxious to introduce it but we took the bill that the President's Committee of Six had drawn up. We emasculated that bill; we threw out of it provision after provision, and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Reed], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. Gurney], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Truman], and other Senators, and I worked night and day for 2 solid months. We satisfied the bus and truck interests; we satisfied practically all the water carriers; and we satisfied practically all the divergent interests, not in every detail, because there are conflicts between some of the railroads; there are conflicts in some instances between railroad workers and the railroads; there are conflicts between the common carriers and contract carriers by truck and bus, and conflicts between water carriers by water and common carriers; but we did the very best we could, and I think that we have worked out a pretty fair bill.

It is not going to provide a utopia; it is not going to be the solution for all the railroad problems by any manner of means. However, when it is said that something has been taken from the Commerce Committee and given to the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Committee, let me remind the Senate that the Commerce Committee took the measure for the regulation of air transportation away from the Interstate Commerce Committee; they took the measure providing for the regulation of shipping, so far as they could, away from the Interstate Commerce Committee; they set up a different board because certain interests wanted subsidies, and the only way they could get subsidies was to set up another board.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator point out the third provision?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; the third provision-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] has the floor.

Mr. DANAHER. I yield for the purpose of the conclusion of this discussion. I assume that it will come back to my point at some time.

Mr. WHEELER. I beg pardon of the Senator from Connecticut. I thought the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EL-LENDER] had the floor.

Mr. ELLENDER. No; the Senator from Connecticut yielded to me so that I might question the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. The third provision, referred to by the Senator from Louisiana, is found on page 27, line 13, and reads as follows:

That differences in the classifications, rates, fares, charges, rules, regulations, and practices of a water carrier in respect transportation from those in effect by a rail carrier with respect to rail transportation shall not be deemed to constitute unjust discrimination, prejudice, or disadvantage, or an unfair or destructive competitive practice within the meaning of section 1 of this act.

So in three different places we have gone on record and done everything that is humanly possible to protect different forms of transportation.

No shipper, no shipping interest has come before the committee and suggested that any amendment would protect them more than the amendments and provisions which the committee have incorporated in the bill. They have condemned the bill, and said "We do not want to be regulated"; but when they have come before the committee with some suggested amendment to the bill that would protect their interest, in order "to make assurance doubly sure," we have written the amendment into the bill. The experts of the Commission spent pretty nearly all of one day with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Shipstead] and some of those who were interested with him in this matter in working out amendments, and we adopted every amendment of a practical character, so as to be sure that the bill will protect the interests of the water carriers. We have done more; we have gone further in trying to assure protection to the shipping interests of the country, and at the same time have a fairer bill than we have had in behalf of any other class of the transportation business of the country.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Tennessee in order that he may make an inquiry of the Senator from Montana?

Mr. DANAHER. Yes. Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, before the Senator from Louisiana leaves, I desire to interject a word or two, although not on the same matter that he brought up when he first asked the chairman the question. I desire to call attention to the paragraph on page 27 which the Senator from Montana has just read, and inquire whether or not the Senator from Louisiana has read that paragraph.

Mr. ELLENDER. I have.

Mr. STEWART. And I inquire what effect the Senator thinks that paragraph would have on controlling the Commission in making rates.

The question I want to ask the chairman, if I may, is whether or not the provision that has just been read from page 27, which I have had before me for several minutes, would be construed by him as a direction to the Interstate Commerce Commission in fixing freight rates for the different carriers, or whether it is simply a matter of discretion?

Mr. WHEELER. We put in that provision at the instance of the water carriers themselves, because they wanted it, and they felt that it protected them. That is correct; is it not?

Mr. ELLENDER. There is nothing mandatory in the bill. of course. I am in hopes that the Commission will entertain the view of the Senator from Montana whenever the question of water rates comes before it. I do not oppose regulation, but I feel that the Interstate Commerce Commission may probably be influenced in establishing the same rates for water as for rail, since its business is and has been primarily, for fixing rail rates.

Mr. WHEELER. We put the provision in the bill expressly and exactly as the most radical group of water carriers on the Mississippi River wanted it, and we thought if we did that we ought to satisfy them. It was their provision, and we took it verbatim and put it in for them. The mandatory provisions, of course, are in section 30 of the bill, which directs the Interstate Commerce Commission to recognize the factors to which I have already referred. That is not permissive. That is a

Mr. STEWART. The point I meant to stress is this: Section 6 provides that it shall be unlawful to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, association, and so forth, and then provides that it shall not be considered a preference or advantage if a difference is made in the classifications, rates, fares, charges, rules, regulations, and practices of a water carrier in respect of water transportation from those in effect by a rail carrier with respect to rail transportation.

Construing that entire section, my thought was, and the question I ask is, Whether it would not actually be giving an advantage or an unreasonable preference if the rates of water carriers were made equal with those of railroads under that section?

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct. I do not think there is any doubt about that.

Mr. STEWART. It would give an unreasonable preference to a railroad concern.

Mr. ELLENDER. But the difference in the rate established would not be considered discriminatory.

Mr. STEWART. Why would it not be an unreasonable preference if rates of water carriers were made equal with those of railroads?

Mr. ELLENDER. The rates would not have to be the same. If they differed, let us say, between the same points, the mere fact that water rates were lower than rail rates in itself would not be considered discriminatory. Suppose the rate on flour, let us say, from St. Louis to New Orleans is 25 cents a hundred, and by rail it is 35 cents. Under the language of the amendment just read, the fact that there is a difference of 10 cents between the two rates would not be considered discriminatory. Is not that true? I address my question to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. WHEELER. The shipping people were afraid it would be, unless they had this provision in the bill.

Mr. ELLENDER. I understand; but is it not true that the purpose of the provision is that should there be differences in classifications, rates, and so forth, as between the rail rates and water rates, that such differences would not be deemed to constitute unjust discrimination?

Mr. WHEELER. That is true.

Mr. REED. Let me add my assurances, out of a good deal of experience in rate litigation, to the assurance which the Senator from Montana has given the Senator from Louisiana, that that is a protection to the water carrier, and there is no reason for anybody to think that that protection will be disturbed in any degree.

Mr. ELLENDER. My hope is that the Commission will be mindful of the statements made by the Senators from Montana and Kansas. It is my understanding that the Commission is not in anywise empowered to fix the same rates for water transportation as prevail for rail transportation.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut permit me to ask the Senator from Montana a question?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. LODGE. I refer to communications I have received regarding contract carriers which are not in competition with common carriers, more specifically steamship lines carrying coal.

Mr. WHEELER. They are fully protected under the bill, under paragraph (7), at the top of page 9, section 2, which reads as follows:

(7) Nothing in this act shall apply to the transportation of property by interstate contract carriers by water which by reason of the inherent nature of the commodities transported, their requirement of special equipment, or their shipment in bulk, is not actually and substantially competitive with transportation by interstate common carriers by water in the same trade or route; and the Commission shall proceed immediately to determine the transportation to be so excluded and shall from time to time make such modificaof its findings as may be necessary to carry out the policy declared in section 1.

Mr. LODGE. The only reason, then, why they are not excluded in the first place is because the administration of the act will be simpler if this arrangement is followed?

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct; and I may say that the suggestion was made to specify various commodities. Somebody wanted to specify coal, and somebody wanted to specify iron, but the matter cannot be handled in that way, because in a bill of this character it is impossible to start to write in specific articles without destroying the effectiveness of the bill. This provision is much better and much simpler for the person in whom the Senator is interested than if we had expressly said "coal," or something of the kind.

Mr. LODGE. I thank the Senator from Montana. I also thank the Senator from Connecticut.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] to return to section 22, on page 78 of the bill, and reconsider certain amendments adopted?

Mr. WHEELER. I shall have to object to that request. As I explained to the Senator, we went into that subject very carefully. The Commission itself for several years recommended that the time be cut down to 90 days. another recommendation, I think, they suggested 6 months. When we wrote this bill and introduced it, we put the time at 1 year. Some persons came before the committee-I believe the representatives of State commissions, if I am not mistaken, and some lawyers who are interested in this particular class of litigation-and suggested that it should be a longer period. We suggested to them 18 months; and everybody-those who were opposed to the period we had in the bill, and everybody else-said that was entirely satisfactory and would fully take care of the situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I also interpreted the observations of the Senator from Montana as being an objection. While I listened with great interest to the remarks of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Reed], I was only two-thirds convinced; and, with that thought in mind, I respectfully move that the Senate reconsider the votes by which committee amendments made to section 22 and appearing on pages 78 and 79 were adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut to recur to section 22 and reconsider the votes by which the amendments were adopted on day before yesterday. The motion is in order.
Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I should like to be heard briefly on the motion.

The law, as it stands today and as it has stood for years, provides a period of 3 years. Whether the Interstate Commerce Commission recommended 90 days or 6 months, or whether the Committee on Interstate Commerce wrote in a year and a half or any other period, we still have before us a bill that is so complex and far-reaching that if it is going to help the railroads at all, it necessarily follows that it is going to be necessary to revamp rates.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED] the other day told us that the amount of traffic which the roads today are carrying would have to be increased from 20 to 25 percent in order to have them operate successfully at present rates. It follows that either the shipping situation or the motortruck situation is going to be torn down in order to elevate the railroads, or railroad rates are going to be increased, which obviously means that the public is going to have to pay an extra amount for that service,

With all of our complex transportation system unified under the bill, I submit that more than ever we ought to retain the 3-year period within which to make application for refunds for overcharges. I submit that in the interest of shippers it is no less than a fair and equitable result, at least until we gain the experience that the bill calls for.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, let me clarify the matter. The statement has been made upon the floor of the Senate that if this bill passes, it is going to raise railroad rates. I say here and now that this bill is not being passed in order to give the railroads an opportunity to raise rates, because, in my judgment, what the railroads will have to do if they are going to succeed is to reduce their rates. As I expressed the matter heretofore, the railroads are a mass-production industry, and in order to have a mass-production industry succeed it must have mass consumption.

There are a great many persons who want to travel in this country, and they would travel if railroad rates were reduced. Likewise, in my judgment, there would be a tremendously greater shipment of freight if shipping rates were reduced.

I have introduced a bill at this session of Congress with the idea of reducing rates. There is not anything in this legislation that tends to bring about an increase of rates. The railroads are hoping, as everybody else is hoping, that business will pick up, and that they will have an increased volume of business. If they have an increased volume of business the railroads can succeed, but they cannot increase rates. I was opposed to the last increase of rates, and publicly so stated. I felt that it would be an injustice to the railroads themselves, that it would not do any good, and I do not think it did any good. I do not think any suggestion about their raising rates will help them. It will simply mean that they will drive business away from them. It will drive business into other forms of transportation because more persons who are engaged in such businesses as the automobile industry, the oil industry, and the steel industry will set up their own forms of transportation, and will themselves haul their products. So there is today competition in the railroad industry which did not exist 20 or 30 years ago, and it is a very keen competition; and there cannot be any thought on the part of an intelligent railroad management of asking for increased rates at this time. The intelligent railroad manager's problem is how he is going to be able to reduce rates in order to keep the transportation.

With reference to this particular amendment, I desire to state that I have not any particular interest in it one way or the other; but we have already passed upon it, and we gave it a great deal of consideration in the committee. The attorneys for the shipping people were before us, the representatives of the State commissions were before us, and they were all agreed that this provision was fair and just.

That is all I have to say about the matter. It is not vital to the bill either way.

Mr. FRAZIER. I appreciate what the Senator from Montana has said to the effect that the rates should not be raised. I agree with that statement. The trouble is that the Senator from Montana is not going to be on the Interstate Commerce Commission, in all probability, and the railroads have repeatedly asked for increases in their rates. They have had some increases, and have repeatedly asked for more increases. If water rates are raised and truck rates are raised and bus rates are raised, there will be more of an incentive for the railroads to continue to ask for increases in their rates, it seems to me.

Personally, I cannot help agreeing with the statement made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Shipstead] when he said that the railroad situation had not been solved. There are a great many other problems which have not been solved, including the farm question.

Increases in freight rates are a special tax on the producers, on the farmers. There is no getting away from the fact that freight rates are a tax, and the farmers pay a large share of the tax. If there is to be an increase in the tax through an increase in water rates, which would probably be brought about by the pending bill, even if freight rates were not increased, which would mean higher rates on some other products which are shipped now part way by water, the water rates would have something to do with the rates we pay. Until the farm question is settled and the farmers given a profit on the products they raise, it does not seem to me there is much chance of the railroads being prosperous. Even if they raised their rates, that would not bring them prosperity, because there are not enough products to be shipped.

I wish to say just a word about the amendment now pending, the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut. I have received a letter just this afternoon from the secretary of the Hardware Retail Association of North Dakota. The secretary of that association calls my attention to section 22 of the bill, which provides for cutting down the time for making claims for excessive freight rates. I wish to read an excerpt from the letter. He states:

We do not believe this time limit is sufficient for our members to accumulate their freight bills, send them to us, and our office in turn forward them to our auditors in Minneapolis. We believe our members are entitled to these overcharges, as the

We believe our members are entitled to these overcharges, as the railroads have not devised a system as yet whereby they collect the correct amount of freight charges, and in many cases the charges are too high.

We know that if the time limit is reduced from 3 years to 18 months it would prevent a great many of our members from taking advantage of recovering freight overcharges which are justly due them. This does not only apply to hardware merchants but is in the interest of all branches of retailing as well.

I think that is correct. From past experience the secretary of the Hardware Retail Association of North Dakota claims that the 18 months would not be sufficiently long.

I have never had any particular experience in this matter, but I have succeeded in collecting overcharges on freight in one or two cases, and I know it takes a long time. A shipper has his freight agent send a statement to headquarters—in our case in St. Paul—and it takes them months before they will answer the letter, even to give the shipper the figures he needs. Then it takes more months before the matter is straightened out, and by the time the shipper gets his adjustment I am afraid it will run over the 18 months. I am strongly in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. Certainly this much is true, is it not: Whether the rates are increased or decreased, the difficulty of adjusting them remains?

Mr. FRAZIER. That is correct.

Mr. DANAHER. And the time required will still be the 3 years permitted by the present law as a fair and equitable adjustment period. Is not that true?

Mr. FRAZIER. It is. Railroad companies seem to have a habit of overcharging in freight rates. Only a few months ago I shipped a box of books to the State penitentiary in North Dakota. I had received a request from the warden of the penitentiary for reading matter for the inmates of the institution, and, as I happened to have quite a number of extra books and magazines in my office, I got them together and packed them in a box and sent them to the freight office. When the statement was received it seemed to me the freight charge was very high. I called the company on the telephone and said, "That freight charge is too high, in my opinion. I do not see how you could make it that. I wish you would check it over." They checked it and found that it was 30 or 40 percent higher than the rate should have been. It did not take 3 years to get the adjustment. Because I happened to be right here and to be a Member of the United States Senate, they gave me the adjustment very quickly; but if I had been a farmer, it would have been a different proposition.

In my opinion 3 years is none too long for the making of adjustments, and inasmuch as we have had that time for all these years, and it has not proved any hardship that I have ever heard of, I think it should remain as it is. I suppose the railroads are interested in having the claims satisfied and out of the way as quickly as possible, but they themselves have been a large factor in holding up the settlements—that is, increasing the time—because of their slowness in giving the figures to those who have asked for them, It seems to me that the 3 years would be none too long.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GUFFEY in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut that the votes by which certain amendments to section 22 were agreed to be reconsidered.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 34, line 4, after the word "employees", it is proposed to strike out the comma and the words "post office inspectors" and to insert in lieu thereof "and persons in charge of the mails and when on duty and traveling to and from duty, and all duly accredited agents and officers of the Post Office Department and the Railway Mail Service and post-office inspectors while traveling on official business, upon the exhibition of their credentials."

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, the amendment merely inserts in section 9, in regard to free transportation on railroads, the provision of the present law. The counsel for the Post Office Department called me up this morning and sent me a copy of the present law. I took the matter up with the Senator from Montana and the other members of the committee, and there is no objection to inserting the provision of the present law in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate and open to further amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5324) to amend the National Housing Act, and for other purposes.

REGULATION OF MODES OF TRANSPORTATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2009) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by extending its application to additional types of carriers and transportation and modifying certain provisions thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I do not intend to detain the Senate long. I should like to have as much quiet as possible for the reason that I should prefer not to lift my voice.

Yesterday I stated that today I would offer a motion to refer the pending bill to the Committee on Commerce. I am not going to do that. I will state my reason. I think we can present the issue with another amendment which I shall directly send forward and ask to be read.

Moreover, I am of the opinion that my motion comes rather late, and would not be entertained quite as favorably on account of an impression that the motion would tend to delay the consideration of the bill and perhaps the adjournment of the Congress, which is hoped for by some.

The amendment I offer proposes to amend by inserting at the proper place in the bill a new section, as follows:

All forms of water transportation, except joint rail-and-water rates, are hereby excepted and exempted from the operations of this act.

I take it that the amendment needs no explanation as to its import. It merely exempts from the operations of the act the intercoastal transportation, the Gulf transportation, the inland waterway transportation, meaning the Mississippi Valley transportation, and the transportation of what is known as the inland waterway on the Atlantic coast. If the amendment is adopted, the consequences will be that all those forms of water transportation, which are now under regulation of the Maritime Commission, under the act of 1916 and the act of 1933, will be under the same regulation. That means that the inland waterway, that the Mississippi Valley waterway, and the inland waterway on the Atlantic coast, will not be under the proposed regulation, as they are not now under regulation. I understand that an amendment has been agreed to which exempts from the force and effect of the bill the waterway transportation on the Great Lakes to the extent that it is competitive with the foreign-and I understand that to mean Canadian-commerce.

Mr. President, that is the situation as it is presented. What are the reasons for offering the amendment? The first reason is that the waterway transportation known as the intercoastal transportation—that is from the Pacific to the Atlantic and the Atlantic to the Pacific through the Panama Canal-is already under sufficient and independent regulation. So far as the inland waterways are concerned, the Mississippi Valley waterways and the Atlantic coast waterways, there is no demand from the public, and none from the shipping, and none from the consumers, that those public waterways created by our Government, for the whole people, shall be subjected to regulation. There is no competition there. There are no complaints there.

Moreover, the Mississippi Valley transportation and the Atlantic seaboard transportation from the point of Florida really to New York, as shown on the map on the wall of the Senate Chamber, account for only 3 percent of the freight traffic in this country. What good purpose would be served in the way of helping the railroads by regulating that traffic? The regulation of 3 percent of the total traffic is negligible to start with. Assume we could so regulate the water traffic that we give it all to the railroads, it would be so small a contribution that it would not even remotely tend to get them out of the condition in which they now are.

Take the intercoastal transportation from the Pacific to the Atlantic and the Atlantic to the Pacific. That transportation accounts for only seven and one-half million tons out of 220,000,000 tons; that is to say, the railroads now have 208,000,000 tens of the transportation on our continent. The intercoastal shipping from the Pacific to the Atlantic and back again amounts to only seven and one-half million tons, and the gain there would be only 3 percent.

Take both systems of water transportation together; 3 percent on the eastern seaboard and in the Mississippi Valley, and 3 percent on the intercoastal transportation would amount to only 6 percent of all the traffic. Give it all to the railroads, and it would serve no good purpose. No one wishes to do that, but give it all to them and the railroads would not be delivered from their present condition.

So, insofar as the argument has been made that the legislation is proposed in order to extricate the railroad systems from a bad situation, I say that even if all the transportation involved in the Mississippi Valley and on our Atlantic coast and on the Pacific were given to the railroads, it would really not serve the purpose contemplated by this proposed legislation.

No one wishes to do that. No one would like that to be done. But if that is not going to be done by the proposed legislation, what is going to be done that will help the railroads? I will come to that question in a moment.

I should like to say with respect to that point, that I am a friend of the railroads of the United States. I consider them just as important to the national economy as any other institutions in the land—perhaps more so. I consider them just as important to the national defense as any other institutions we have. The Army and Navy are great arms, but they could not get far without the railroads. I wish to help the railroads; but I say that no one advocating the bill has substantially responded to my little question of yesterday, "Show me wherein this legislation will aid the railroads." I think the considerations I have just submitted tend, at any rate, to convince every Senator that, so far as the railroads are concerned, there is nothing whatever to be gained by changing the present regulation of our intercoastal shipping. our Mississippi Valley shipping, and our Atlantic Inland Waterway shipping from the present status to the status of regulation under the Interstate Commerce Commission.

There is one difference, and I wish to point it out. It is proposed in the bill to put the systems of shipping and transportation to which I have referred under the order of certificates of convenience and necessity. I am saying that we do not wish that to be done with respect to our waterway systems, that is, the intercoastal and the inland systems. Why? A certificate of convenience and necessity looks always to monopoly. The bill provides that those systems of transportation which are now using the intercoastal and inland waterways shall have such certificates as a matter of right, and that those facilities shall be closed to competition by others, closed to new enterprise. Where we now have freedom of effort, where we now have freedom of competition, it is deliberately proposed, without demand from the people, without complaint of any sort, and without the prospect of directly helping the railroads, to bring in, on the waterways which our land created and for which the Federal Government is responsible, the system of monopoly, which all parliaments and all governments, from the days of Henry VIII, and even prior to that, in the days of the common law, until now, have abhorred.

I am saying, as a Senator from that portion of the country which is served by the inland waterways, that we want no monopolies in that section. We want the little shipper and the big shipper to have their opportunity. If I wish to start a boat line down there to serve the people, I want to have the right to do it. I do not want anybody to say that I must come to Washington and appear before the Interstate Commerce Commission and ask for a certificate of convenience and necessity, and probably be turned down in the interest of somebody already operating.

I take it that on the shipping from the Pacific to the Atlantic and from the Atlantic to the Pacific, through our Panama Canal—and it is ours, created by the Federal Government for the benefit of all people-neither the Senate, nor the Government, nor the American consumer, nor the American farmer wishes to commit that system of transportation to the policy of monopoly, which is precisely what the bill would do. As matters stand, that cannot be done. As matters stand, the waterways are highways of commerce, free to all the people. As matters stand, the rates must meet the terms of competition and the necessities and demands of the people. As matters now stand, exorbitant profits cannot be made; for the unerring economic law will work in every case. However, if we change the situation, we place the two great waterways of our land, the Panama Canal waterway and our inland waterways, for which we have spent almost unnumbered millions of dollars, in the position of becoming highways of monopoly instead of highways of free competition.

So, Mr. President, as a matter of public policy, considering the expenditure of the hundreds of millions of dollars necessary to create these two systems of transportation, I protest against the policy which intends, after all these years of development, to turn them over and expose them to the very monopolistic practices which the present administration so often denounces, and which every American must oppose.

Mr. President, I think what I have said should be sufficient; but I shall undertake to answer the question which I asked on yesterday, and which the proponents of the bill did not see fit to answer, so far as I am the judge. I do not say that by way of reflection, because if my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, thinks he has shown wherein the bill will aid the railroads, I am willing to give him credit for so thinking. However, on that question, Senators are the witnesses, and the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce and I are not the judges.

On what theory can it be said that the transfer of intercoastal shipping and inland waterways shipping to the Interstate Commerce Commission will aid the railroads? I have searched my mind for the answer to that question, and I can find only one answer which is consistent with the proposal.

I think it must be intended to have the Interstate Commerce Commission establish rates between the Atlantic and the Pacific and between the Pacific and the Atlantic, through our Panama Canal, at a point which will enable the transcontinental railroads to compete for that traffic. If I am wrong about that, I do not see how we could otherwise help the railroads. If I am right, then I put the Senate and the American people on notice that the deliberate proposal is to lift the water rates in order that the railroads may lift their rates. I leave that question to the judgment of Senators. That is my view, and if I am right about that, who will pay the bill? The railroads will not pay it. The ships will not pay it. The farmers, the consumers, and the miners of America will pay the bill. We have not heard from the farmers.

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to complete my sentence. We have not heard from the consumers; and if my friend now rises to say a kind word for the farmers and the consumers on this question, I am doubly glad to yield to him.

Mr. TRUMAN. I am saying a kind word for the farmers and the consumers; for they pay the freight all the time. They are now paying it, and they will continue to pay it. It will not make any difference whether the bill passes or not. The same people will pay the freight after the passage of the

Mr. BAILEY. I am in full agreement with the Senator: and I am protesting that they will be required to pay more.

Mr. TRUMAN. They will not be required to pay more under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, how will the bill help the railroads? Mr. TRUMAN. We are trying to establish a transportation policy for the United States Government.

Mr. BAILEY. How could that policy help the railroads unless their income were improved?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator asks a question. I said to him yesterday that it is not a question of helping the railroads; and I think it ought to be clear that the bill is not introduced primarily with the idea that it will help the railroads. The statement has been made repeatedly that the object of the bill is to help the railroads. The object of the bill is to help the railroads insofar as we can correct some undesirable practices and speed up the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The bill seeks to give equality to the railroads in the same respect in which we give equality to everybody else. I do not think the Senator from North Carolina, who is noted for his fairness, can say to the American people that we want the railroads in a strait jacket with reference to their rates, but that the water carriers, their competitors, should be free. If the Senator takes that position, then I say there is only one thing we ought to do. If we are not to regulate the water carriers, if we are to let them resort to any practice they wish to follow, including rebates and everything else, then let us say to the railroads of the country, "We will repeal the law regarding the regulation of your rates." Let us turn them loose; let us go back to the law of the jungle, and let the best man win. Who would suffer in the long run? It would be the shippers of the country, the farmers, and the miners, about whom the Senator is now speaking.

Mr. BAILEY. I am much obliged to my good friend. I understood, and I stated yesterday without contradiction, that this proposed legislation arose upon the report of the committee appointed on September 23, 1938, by the President of the United States to submit recommendations upon the general transportation situation. That is the title of the committee. Now here is what their report says:

The major factor in the present distressed condition of the railroads is the low volume of their traffic.

That is what I said yesterday.

A contributing factor is the depressed character of many of their

If that is one of the troubles, it is proposed to lift them; if rates are depressed, then lift them.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. BAILEY. I will read a little further and then I will

The competitive modes of transportation are partially respon-

"The competitive modes," that is water transportation and rail transportation-are partially responsible for the former and almost wholly responsible for the latter.

There is the major premise of this proposed legislation.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that he is sadly mistaken with reference to the statement he is making. I am sure he wants to be fair. Let me state the major reason for this proposed legislation. It was suggested a long time before the Committee of Six was ever heard of. The Senator is speaking with reference to water carriers because water transportation is what he is interested in and the regulation of such transportation he says was recommended by the committee. The Senator can go back to the Interstate Commerce Commission reports 50 years ago and find a recommendation by the Interstate Commerce Commission for the regulation of water carriers and saying that all forms of transportation ought to be regulated.

However, in 1935, when Commissioner Eastman was coordinator-and no Member of this body will attempt to stand on the floor and say that Joe Eastman has been railroadminded or that he is not one of the great outstanding public servants of the United States-he drafted a bill. In 1935 I introduced that bill, and portions of the pending bill were taken from the bill then introduced by me, which was drafted by Mr. Eastman as coordinator and sent to the committee. That bill was reported by the committee, I think unanimously, if I am not mistaken.

So there is the recommendation, not of the Committee of Six, but of the coordinator.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the Senator, and I begin to believe that if I do not succeed in making a good speech this afternoon he will at least be able to say that he made two good ones in the midst of mine. However, since he quoted Mr. Eastman, I am going to quote Mr. Eastman. I regard Mr. Eastman as the foremost expert on railroad transportation in the country.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. BAILEY. I wish to complete my statement, and I will yield.

I regard Mr. Eastman as one of the ablest men dealing with this great problem. I am very much inclined to follow Mr. Eastman's judgment. I do not know of anyone who questions his integrity or his capacity or his experience. Here is what he says about this bill:

Mr. Eastman does not anticipate that the regulation of water carriers will be of any great benefit to the railroads.

He says that himself, and he does not support this proposed legislation.

Mr. WHEELER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BAILEY. I am proceeding on the basis of the testimony in the record.

Mr. WHEELER. I beg the Senator's pardon. Mr. Eastman supported the objectives of the proposed legislation, but he did not like the form in which it is proposed to reach the objectives.

Mr. BAILEY. I will say, then, he is just not supporting the legislation. I agree with the Senator that we all support good objectives. I believe I will make some remarks about that now. The way one approaches an objective is sometimes more important than getting there. One must go straight, keep to the straight and narrow road. That accounts, to a great extent, for my course here in the Congress. I have thought that the way to save the American people was to preserve the form and character of the American Republic. That is a way of reaching the objective, but it is not the objective. In my judgment, the form and character of the approach are indispensable to the objective. I will agree with anybody about good objectives, but I am saying that Mr. Eastman says that this is not the proper method.

I will yield to the Senator from Minnesota in a few minutes, but I wish to answer my friend from Montana first. He was saying that the report to which I have adverted was not quite the foundation that I thought it was. I just now read from the report of the President's committee. Now, by way of further reply, I am going to read from the report of the Interstate Commerce Committee itself:

In 1938 President Roosevelt appointed a special committee to study the railroad problem. That committee, composed of Commissioners Splawn, Eastman, and Mahaffie of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and unofficially designated as the Committee of Three, made certain definite recommendations. They urged, among other things, the creation of a transportation board. They likewise recommended the regulation of water carriers by a central regulatory body.

* *
On September 23, 1938, President Roosevelt appointed another

On September 23, 1938, President Roosevelt appointed another special committee, this one known as the President's Committee of Six, to further study the railroad problem and to make recommendations. On December 23, 1938, this Committee of Six, composed of three representatives of railroad management and three representatives of railroad labor, reported its analysis and its proposed solution for the railroad problem.

The recommendations of the President's Committee of Three and the recommendations of the President's Committee of Six, and a careful consideration of the public interest constituted the basis upon which the bill S. 2009 was drafted and introduced.

If I have been mistaken about that, and if I have been misled about that, I submit that I have been mistaken, and I have been misled because I put full faith and confidence in the report which the Committee on Interstate Commerce filed with the Senate of the United States. That report is my authority.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator does not need to apologize for that, because it is in the report. However, the Senator from North Carolina is interested in waterways; that is what he is talking about. I again call his attention to the fact that in 1935 I introduced a bill which provided for the regulation of water carriers. The provisions contained in that bill of 1935 are the same, with a few modifications, as are found in the pending bill. We took the provisions of the bill of 1935, which I introduced and which was drafted by Coordinator Eastman, and put them in this bill. After the bill reached the committee, because some water carriers had made certain suggestions, we amended the bill to comply with the request of the water carriers.

It is not accurate to say that this bill, particularly the portions to which the Senator refers, is based solely on the recommendations of the Committee of Six. We did take the recommendations of the Committee of Six, and we used them as a basis for much that is contained in the pending bill, but I am trying to point out to the Senator that back in 1935, if he will consult the record, he will find that we held hearings upon this particular portion of the proposed legislation, and that was long before the Committee of Six was ever heard of or ever thought of.

Mr. BAILEY. I have no disagreement about that, but I think it is accurate to state what is contained in the report of the committee, and I will reiterate it. I read from page 2 of the report of the committee signed by my good friend the Senator from Montana, the chairman of the committee:

The recommendations of the President's Committee of Three and the recommendations of the President's Committee of Six, and a careful consideration of the public interest constituted the basis upon which the bill, S. 2009, was drafted and introduced.

That is all I have said; that is all I have contended.

Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate, but I have one other argument to make.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I do not wish to intrude on the Senator, but I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well; I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I thought the Senator from North Carolina said a while ago, in his colloquy with the Senator from Missouri, that the only way by which the railroads could be helped would be by raising the rates. Did I correctly understand the Senator?

Mr. BAILEY. No; I did not say that. I said the only way in which they could be helped under this bill would be by raising the rates. That is quite a different proposition.

Mr. HATCH. The proposition which the Senator has stated is one which I have not understood from the terms of the bill. I confess I am not as familiar with the bill as I should be; but I want to say that I do not think raising rates is at all necessary to help the railroads. On the contrary, raising rates is very often destructive of revenue. Even a reduction of rates may produce more revenue and more business, and a railroad company may prosper more at the lower rates than at the higher rates.

That is the thought which was in my mind.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the Senator. He clearly misunderstood me. I said the only theory on which it could be said that this bill would aid the railroads was that the Commission would lift the water rates in order to enable the railroads to lift their transcontinental rates. I will add to that statement that the only theory on which we could justify putting under the Interstate Commerce Commission our inland waterways, the Mississippi River and the Atlantic inland waterways, the only argument that could be made that would show that that would help the railroads, would be that the rates in the Mississippi Valley are going to be lifted and the rates on the Atlantic coast are going to be lifted in order to enable the railroads to lift their rates. I think that is as plain as it can be on its face; but that is not saying that we should lift railroad rates.

I think I understand what is up. Take the Gulf coast: Ninety million tons annually are now being shipped from the Gulf coast out of Texas ports, Louisiana ports, and Alabama We had the argument here about the Florida canal that 90,000,000 tons of shipping would pass through it; and there is 90,000,000 tons of shipping out of those ports, most of it on the way to the Atlantic. A great deal of that shipping is oil. A great deal of it goes to Charleston, where there are big refineries, then to Savannah, then to Wilmington, N. C., then to Norfolk, then to Baltimore, then to Wilmington, Del., and then to Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and Portland. The railroads want part of that oil transportation, and the only ways in the world in which they could get it would be either to lift the rates of the contract carriers or to lift the rates of the tankers. I think that is perfectly plain.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, who owns the tankers?

Mr. BAILEY. The private companies own a great many of them.

Mr. WHEELER. There is nothing in this legislation that could affect them if we wanted to do so.

Mr. BAILEY. There is a great deal in the legislation that affects the contract carriers.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; but, as I have repeatedly said upon the floor of the Senate, we cannot by this legislation affect the private companies. I think something ought to be done, and other Members have suggested that they thought something ought to be done, to make the persons pay who own oil tankers which are using the Great Lakes, and particularly the waterways developed at Government expense, to make money which they are sticking in their pockets; but there is not any way in which that can be done except by charging tolls for the use of the waterways, and there is nothing in the pending bill which does that. I think such persons should pay the Government in order to help pay for building the waterways; but there is not anything in the bill along that line, and so there cannot be anything to the argument, because the oil companies own and operate their own vessels.

Mr. BAILEY. They own them to a great extent; but there are contract carriers moving out of the Gulf, and also independent carriers.

I am glad the Senator from Montana made the confession that he did. He is a perfectly candid man. He speaks of the alternative of charging tolls on the inland waterway. which runs through my State. I will say that a delegation of railroad executives came to my room in the month of February and asked me whether I would introduce legislation establishing tolls on the inland waterways of the United States. They had with them a representative of one of the brotherhoods. I listened to them. I respected them. When they got through, I said, "Such a bill as that may be introduced in the Senate of the United States at some time by somebody, but it will never have my name on it. Those inland waterways were created by the taxes of the people. They could not stand tolls. If you put a toll on them you are destroying the one means of transportation whereby the people can get cheap motor oil and cheap food."

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator a question. Does he know of any oil company that gives the people the benefit of cheap water transportation?

I read here the other day a letter from Memphis, Tenn.and I should like to have it here now-in which a representative of one of the oil companies said, "Why, of course, we take the money and put it in our pocket, and do not pass it on to the consumer." The oil companies ship crude oil by truck into Montana, and claim they can ship it cheaper than by rail, and refine it into gasoline in the State. They produce the crude oil in the oil fields, ship it to the refinery in Montana, and turn out gasoline; and what do they charge the consumers in Montana for it? They charge them for gasoline the price in the Oklahoma field plus the railroad freight rate to Montana, when it is refined in Montana. That is what is done by the big oil companies the Senator is talking

The shipping interests that came down to protest against this bill, called some kind of an "institute," were controlled by whom? By two of the big monopolies, oil and steel. The Senator talks about monopoly. They are the boys who were opposed to this legislation. It was they who came before the Interstate Commerce Committee and, through their lawyer and through their institute—not as individuals, but through the institute which they control-were opposing the

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. BAILEY. I wish to answer the Senator from Montana, and then I will yield.

The Senator from Montana has just argued that, no matter what this country might do by way of providing canals and similar means of transportation, the oil companies would take advantage of them and pocket the money. Now, grant that that may be so. I affirm that if that is remotely so, it is not the duty of the Congress to lift the rates or to regulate the waterways to meet so monstrous a situation. It is the duty of the Congress to stretch forth the strong arm of the Government of the United States and put an end to business so nefarious and so oppressive. There is a fine opportunity for it; but do not take it out on the waterways. Take it out on the persons who perpetrate the wrong.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, would the Senator mind my reading him some testimony? This is sworn testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BAILEY. I will thank the Senator to do it.

Mr. WHEELER. There was considerable testimony in the discussion before the committee and in the hearings before the subcommittee as to whether or not, if there are any savings in rates because water transportation may be cheaper than rail or motor transportation between the same points, the shipper gets the benefit of the reduced rates.

In a recent hearing before the Interstate Commerce Commission held at Memphis, Tenn., in February 1937, in Fourth Section Application No. 17413, involving rates on gasoline and kerosene from the Baton Rouge group to Alabama points, Mr. A. M. Stephens, general traffic manager of the Standard Oil Co. of Kentucky, testified:

We do not take into consideration any evaporation charges in connection with any surveys we made for any individual terminals, because we find that on all of our inland waterways terminals we because we find that on all of our inland waterways terminals we amortize this investment. As to our inland waterways terminals, we usually amortize them within 2 or 3 years. In other words, the money we make on our water terminals we put in our pocket. We do not pass it on to the consumer. No other oil company does that I know of, except where there is price competition, and naturally in that connection we have a depreciation set up that may last for 10 years; but in the meantime we have fully amortized the investment shown in our accounting procedure, and the economy that we realize is credited to the P. & L. account for margin. We have such great savings in our water terminals, inland waterways terminals, that we eliminate entirely evaporation and insurance in all of our calculations. That enters into our general ac-ways terminals, that we eliminate entirely evaporation and insurance in all of our calculations. That enters into our general account by reason of the great number of water terminals operating at the present time on the South Atlantic coast, the Gulf coast, and the Ohio River, and the evaporation loss from our aggregate figures is less than 40 points; in other words, it is less than one-half of 1 percent. I have the figures here showing our evaporation losses in connection with all of our transportation to these Ohio River points which I have indicated, and I will be glad to file them for the record if they are so desired. for the record if they are so desired.

On cross-examination Mr. Stephens testified as follows:

Question (by Mr. Beck). Mr. Stephens, with regard to the possibility of imposition of tolls on these rivers, has that received the full consideration of your committee in dealing with these matters? That is, do you view things like that for any particular time in the Answer. Oh. ves. We exercise our judgment and foresight in the consideration of all of these matters. We have found that none of the other companies are passing any of this money on to the consuming public.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. It is not a question of what they may do; it is a question of what they actually are doing at the present

Mr. BAILEY. Very well; there is a remedy for that. The United States Government is strong enough to obtain for the people of the United States the benefit of the great canals it has created for them with their money. I hope the United States Government will never get to the point where it is not strong enough to maintain the inland waterways and the great Mississippi River, and so to manage them that the benefits of them, which God gave our country for all the people, cannot be realized by the people themselves. If there are wrongs there, I submit that the way to deal with them is to address ourselves to the evils, and not put the penalty on the waterways.

In that connection I call attention to the amendment which is pending, offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Shipstead]. I am not now going to discuss that amendment, but I am going to ask him to discuss it in the light of what has been said by the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee. I will yield to the Senator if he wishes to talk about that amendment; or, if the Senator will let me finish, in 5 minutes I will yield the floor.

Finally, Mr. President, I desire to make an argument which may seem to be a little sectional. Perhaps I am, to some extent, a sectional man; but I am very proud of it. I am very deeply attached to the Southern States; but I hope and pray that I will never find myself where I cannot see the national interest. I hope I may never reach the depth where I would not try to be fair to New England, and the great West, and the North. Ours is all one country; it is all my country; but I am from the South.

I wish Senators would turn to the map for a moment. The southern territory is almost in the nature of an island. It is the only portion of our United States which is surrounded on three sides by navigable water, the Atlantic Ocean, the Gulf of Mexico, and the great Mississippi River. Senators will see the extension of the Tennessee River and also the extension of the Ohio. The red line on the map, in Pennsylvania, approaches the upper reaches of Chesapeake Bay. That system of waterways is one of the great blessings of the South. That has given us cheap transportation. It has given us our export trade in cotton and tobacco.

The United States built that inland waterway seen on the map, apparently stretching from the Chesapeake Bay or the Delaware all the way down to the tip of Florida, and then resuming on the Gulf of Mexico, and going, I think, from Mobile perhaps all the way to Corpus Christi.

Mr. President, that is our national water, and in a sense that is our southern water. That is our means of transportation. We have not had it long. That inland waterway has not yet been completed; the waterway on the Gulf has not been completed, and the waterway up the Missouri River to Sioux City has not been completed; but when they are completed we will have a great, free, open waterway, on which food and manufactures can be carried to the people, and on which the products of the farms and the mines can be carried to the markets not only of this country but of the whole world.

Shall we bring that waterway system under the bonds of this railroad regulation? Shall we paralyze it in its inception on a theory of aiding the railroads when we know that the only sound application of that theory will be the lifting of the rates, and perhaps the ruin of those waterways for practical purposes?

I think this should be seriously considered by Senators from west of the Mississippi River, from Oklahoma, Arkansas, Missouri, and Texas, and by Senators from the belt which has been largely known as the "old" belt, part of it the upper South, the Southeastern States, referred to by our Presidentand I think not in any invidious way, but in a way which indicated the best of intentions—as the "Nation's economic problem No. 1." I have always thought that there were greater problems in our land than that. I think the economic problem No. 1 in our country is a national problem rather than a regional or sectional problem. I would say the problem of unemployment is a far greater problem than any other problem in my section of the country. I would say the problem of distribution is a far greater problem than any other problem in my section of the country. I would say the problem of inducing American investors, not the rich, but all of us who have a little money which we want to yield interest, to invest their money in enterprise, as I was saying yesterday, is a far greater problem than any problem in the South. But I agree that there is a problem there. The income is lower, I agree. The farm income is lower in the South than it is in the West, and the per capita income generally-I was looking at the figures this morning-is lower in the South. In that sense there is an economic problem there.

I think the destiny of this country lies in the South. I think we have passed through the depression better than any other section of this country. My State is one of the few States in the United States which had a larger income in 1937 than it had in 1929. I am not without hope about the southern portion of the country; but I agree that there is a severe, a real economic problem there.

Are we to solve that economic problem by tying up the Mississippi River, by tying up the inland waterways, putting them under regulation, putting them under certificates of convenience and necessity, putting them under the Interstate Commerce Commission, putting them under legislation which is brought forward as a means of solving the problem of the competitive lines of railroads?

I ask the Senate not to do that. I ask the Senate to treat the Gulf States, I ask them to treat the Southern States on the Atlantic seaboard as they have treated the States on the Great Lakes. I wish to vote for the proposed legislation, and I have said so all the time; but I do not see how Senators can consistently except the Great Lakes from the operation of the proposed act with respect to competition with Canadian lines, without also excepting the Atlantic seaboard and the Gulf with respect to competition; and we have our foreign competition. I ask that much consideration as a matter of fairness to the South; I ask it as a matter of equity.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Mean in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, the contract carriers of the South are going to be in exactly the same position as the contract carriers on the Great Lakes. If the Senator will read the bill with reference to that subject, he will find that the exact provisions with reference to contract carriers apply to contract carriers of the South. There are no contract carriers in the South plying from port to port in foreign competition; and if that does occur, the carriers of the South can apply to the Interstate Commerce Commission and be relieved.

Mr. BAILEY. But the Senator is not saying that he will do for the Atlantic seaboard or the Gulf what he has done for the Great Lakes.

Mr. WHEELER. In the first place, Mr. President, there is no foreign competition, because it is against the law for foreign boats to ply and offer competition in the port-to-port rates, so that the same condition does not apply with reference to the Great Lakes as to the South. An entirely different situation exists on the Great Lakes from that which exists at any other place, because the Great Lakes operators want to compete with the Canadian operators. Such a condition does not exist along the Atlantic coast, but where there are ships which do not compete and by their nature cannot compete, contract carriers and bulk carriers are exempted, just as they are anywhere else.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I am not denying that there is a difference, but I am denying that there is equity in making such a distinction when the consequence of the distinction is to put the inland waterway on the Atlantic seaboard and the inland waterway on the Gulf and the inland waterway up the Mississippi under the regulatory powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission under the objectives of the proposed legislation, but making a broad exception as to the Great Lakes.

Mr. WHEELER. It is perfectly apparent to me that the Senator from North Carolina does not understand the situation on the Great Lakes and does not understand the situation with reference to intercoastal competition. There cannot be any intercoastal business by foreign boats along the Atlantic seaboard or in the Gulf of Mexico. It is against the law, so it cannot exist. On the Great Lakes the only carriers we have exempted are those operating American boats which go into foreign ports and compete with foreign vessels. Such a condition does not exist on the Atlantic seaboard, and cannot exist there. Consequently, when the Senator speaks of equity, there is no such thing as comparison between those two conditions, because they are so dissimilar. In one case it is unlawful, and in the other there is a different situation.

Mr. BAILEY. But the Senator will agree that he set out in this bill, to begin with, to regulate the Great Lakes transportation, and now he has abandoned that. I wish he would abandon it with regard to the inland waterways, the Mississippi River, and the Gulf. Whether he does or not, I am asking the Senate to do it.

Mr. President, I have concluded my argument, but I have one or two further statements to make. My distinguished friend, the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, in the course of an argument this afternoon made a remark—while I was not in the Chamber, but I was informed of it, and if I am mistaken, I wish he would correct me—to the effect that the Maritime Commission had been giving $10 banquets.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, no.

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to be advised about that.

Mr. WHEELER. Not the Maritime Commission. What I stated was that the so-called Dollar Line, which goes by some other name, another flower by another name, and a flower by another name would smell as sweet—

Mr. BAILEY. I will say to the Senator that the proper name of that line is now the "McAdoo Line."

Mr. WHEELER. Very well, the McAdoo Line. I think that is more appropriate. The McAdoo Line—I do not know what the real name of the line is.

Mr. BAILEY. The American Presidents Line.

Mr. WHEELER. But the money was furnished to that line by the Maritime Commission, because the Maritime Commission operates that line. That line, operated by the Maritime Commission, held a banquet in San Francisco that I know of, and I was told that banquets were held by that line in Chicago and in Baltimore. I cannot be positive as to the other banquets, but I know about the banquet being held in San Francisco, and I am quite sure banquets were held by that line in other cities as well. The line gave $10a-plate dinners, and they set someone up on a pedestal, and then they invited in all the politicians and many others, and the money for that purpose came out of the pockets of the American taxpayers, because the Maritime Commission is the one which operates the line. That line has been giving $10-a-plate dinners over the country. They say they wish to do it in order to bring in business. If they hope to bring in business by inviting politicians to Dollar Line $10-aplate dinners, I believe their efforts are in vain. How is a man who owns his own boat going to compete with this line which gives $10-a-plate dinners?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Hill in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. In view of the rather general and vague statements, and perhaps the general and vague information the Senator has with respect to these so-called $10-a-plate banquets, I wish to ask the Senator if it would not be fairer to all the parties involved that a more detailed account be given of the whole affair and perhaps a more accurate account of what actually occurred, for I am sure the Members of the Senate are sufficiently familiar with the character of the members of the Maritime Commission, and certainly with the character of the former Senator from California, the eminent citizen, Mr. McAdoo, who is at the head of the steamship line, not to be willing to attribute to them any lack of judgment or discretion, or to impute to them any impropriety in their official conduct.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not care who is responsible. I say that what was done shows a lack of judgment.

Mr. PEPPER. Lack of judgment in what respect?

Mr. WHEELER. A lack of judgment in holding banquets of the kind that were held throughout the country.

Mr. PEPPER. How much information does the Senator from Montana have on the subject?

Mr. WHEELER. I have some direct information with respect to it.

Mr. PEPPER. Does the Senator have the guest list?

Mr. WHEELER. No, I have not; and I do not want the guest list.

Mr. PEPPER. Does the Senator know how the banquet was paid for?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; I know how the banquet was paid for, and I know that the Maritime Commission knows about it, because I have talked with members of the Commission on that subject. When I was in San Francisco I was given this information by a very responsible individual who lives in San Francisco. He told me about it and I verified it. The excuse for holding the banquet was to get business. They felt that the way to get business over the country was to hold banquets. They felt that they had such great success in San Francisco, having had so large a crowd at the banquet, that they decided to hold banquets in other cities. If they were to hold one in the city of Washington, they could get nearly all the Members of the House and the Senate to attend, and I am sure one could get a great many other people to attend $10-a-plate banquets. The Senator from Florida can defend that action if he wants to, but, so far as I am concerned, I say it shows bad judgment.

Mr. PEPPER. I do not want to interfere with the argument of the Senator from North Carolina, but I wish to make one statement. It is very easy to rise on the floor of the Senate and refer disparagingly to a "$10-a-plate dinner" given by somebody, but unless the Senator is disposed and able at the same time to tell the Senate exactly what happened, and to be able to give the whole setting for the affair, it is not quite fair to disparage either the motives or judgments or intentions of those who are presumably going to do the proper thing.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, my good friend the Senator from Montana is under some misapprehension about this matter. He said that the Maritime Commission operated the Dollar Line ships. The Maritime Commission handles the subsidies which the Congress authorized to those ships.

The Commission does not operate them.

Mr. WHEELER. I beg the Senator's pardon, but I am quite sure the Senator is mistaken in that respect. The Commission does operate them. The Maritime Commission set up the corporation which took over the Dollar Line, and they are operating the Dollar Line at the present time—the American Presidents Steamship Line.

Mr. BAILEY. The American Presidents Line.

Mr. WHEELER. When Mr. McAdoo was chairman of the board he took that steamship company over, and the United States is today operating that line. It is a corporation, but it is an American-operated steamship company, and being operated and directed by the Maritime Commission.

Mr. BAILEY. My information is quite different. But in order to settle the matter in an official way I will have the record sent to the Maritime Commission, get a statement, and put it in the RECORD.

I was undertaking in the best of faith, and without any relevancy to the merits of the argument that I have just now made, to exculpate the Maritime Commission in the premises. My understanding is that Mr. McAdoo is not an official of the United States Government. He is chairman of the board of the steamship corporation. He was appointed at the instance of and with the consent of the Maritime Commission. I would not go further and say who brought about the appointment, because as a matter of fact I do not know.

Mr. WHEELER. It was the Maritime Commission which appointed him.

Mr. BAILEY. I think it was done upon their recommendation, their suggestion. I would not raise any serious question about that. I would not raise any question about the Dollar Line being very heavily subsidized. I am very sorry to say we have reached the time when practically all the shipping lines in the world, in order to operate must be heavily subsidized. But I say that that was not a matter in the control of the Maritime Commission. The steamship line operates under a corporate system, and of course it receives a subsidy.

What the officials of the line did, according to my information, was to set out upon a little system of advertising American shipping and American shipping lines. They conceived the idea of giving banquets in great cities—I do not know how many—probably in San Francisco, Los Angeles, Chicago, and one or two more cities. They thought that would be a better means of advertising than advertising in the newspapers and the magazines. That is a question of judgment.

I know we do not all like banquets. The Democratic Party above all things abhors anything like a banquet. We never have any $100-a-plate banquets. We never like such affairs, and when we have them, we hang our heads in shame. We regard the holding of banquets as a very disgraceful means of accomplishing an end. Of course, I would make my apologies for the party and the Maritime Commission, too, if I thought the Maritime Commission was giving the banquets, but I am satisfied they have not done so. However, I will secure a plain statement with respect to the matter from the Commission.

The Senator from Montana whispers something about it. I hope the Senator does not object to my repeating it.

Mr. WHEELER. I did not whisper; I spoke.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator said he did not whisper. He said that it was done with money that was passed out by the Maritime Commission.

When subsidy money is put in the treasury of a corporation, I take it that it cannot quite be kept separate from other funds of the corporation. Part of the money went for banquets to advertise the line. It may have been imprudent, but I say that the Maritime Commission ought not to be blamed for that, and, above all things, I say that has nothing on earth to do with the waterways in the South or on the Mississippi River. It has nothing on earth to do with the argument as to the waterway transportation between the Pacific and the Atlantic and return.

Having made that statement, I wish to add that the Maritime Commission is engaged in a very great task. I have come in frequent contact with the members of that Commission. I have great confidence in them. I do not believe I will call the names of any of them, because I would have to go through the whole list. They are fine men.

Building up the American merchant marine is one of the great tasks of our Government. I am committed to that task. It is just as important to our commerce and our national defense as are the railroads. I know it is costing much money; I am sorry it is costing so much money; but we are committed to that program, we are hoping to develop shipping, and, so far as I am concerned, I shall ask for the cooperation of the United States Senate with the Maritime Commission in its great undertaking.

I do not mean by that statement to intimate that I believe Senators should vote to give the Commission any jurisdiction in particular. That is not what I have in mind. I want the vote to be based on the merits of the argument I have made today. I do not want the Senate to discount the Maritime Commission because the Dollar Line happened to give a banquet. We Democrats cannot say much about that. We ourselves have held many banquets, and sometimes we have been quarreled with for not going to them.

I shall now discuss another matter, and then I will take my seat. On yesterday, in the discussion between the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON] and myself, the question was raised as to the profits made by corporations in 1926, 1927, 1928, and 1929 as compared with 1937 and 1938. I communicated with the Department of Commerce and obtained the data, which I wish to put in the RECORD:

Reference was made to data printed in the bulletin of the National City Bank. It so happens that I have that bulletin. I wish to introduce the tables which appear therein. They are not relevant to the discussion, but I think the other data are very informative.

The Maritime Commission prepared an analysis of the regulatory powers over carriers by water. I did not put it in the Record yesterday, although probably the consent to do so was implied. I now ask unanimous consent to include it in the Record as a part of my remarks, to be printed at the end of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. BAILEY. I ask that the tables concerning the profits of corporations in the years to which I have referred be printed in the Appendix.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The tables referred to appear in the Appendix.)

Mr. BAILEY. I conclude by submitting the matter to the Senate on its merits.

EXHIBIT A

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE, BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE, Washington, May 25, 1939.

Hon. Josiah W. Balley, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In response to the telephone request received from Mr. James, we are sending herewith a tabulation prepared by the National City Bank on the basis of Treasury Department data showing the ratio of net profit to net worth over the period 1927 to 1936, inclusive. Table 2 covers all active corporations in the United States and table 3 all manufacturing corporations in the United States. United States.

I invite your attention to the fact that these statistics are comprehensive, being based upon the tax returns, whereas the data which you quoted from the May 1939 issue of the National City Bank letter are for 305 corporations, of which 260 are manufacturing concerns. It is not possible to provide comparable data for these 305 corporations for the years 1926-29, inclusive, as this is a sample tabulation made by the National City Bank on the basis of available current reports.

The leading corporations, which publish their statements promptly and therefore provide the basis for such tabulations as the one in the May issue of the bank letter, have probably a better than average performance. This should be kept in mind when using the sample data covering the limited number of corpora-tions. For example, a tabulation by the National City Bank for 1,600 manufacturing and trading corporations for 1936 (published in the April 1937 bulletin) showed a ratio of profits to net worth of 10.1 percent, whereas the table in the January 1939 bulletin, enclosed, for all manufacturing corporations shows a ratio of 8.2

I am also enclosing a comparative tabulation prepared by Standard Statistics, Inc., which provides comparable data for the years 1927 to 1937, inclusive, for a fairly large sample of corporations. This provides two series—one on percent earned on invested capital and one on percent earned on property and investment. This establishes the trend from the peak of the late twenties to the recent peak reached in 1937. The number of corporations included is given in the tabulation.

The monthly letters of the National City Bank are from our files and we would appreciate having them returned when they have served your purpose.

If I can be of further assistance to you at any time, please let me know. Very truly yours,

F. H. RAWLS, Acting Director.

(8) Because of the provisions of various statutes affecting the Philippines, it is believed that the subjects mentioned in items (4), (5), and (6), supra, are not applicable to common carriers by water operating to and from the Philippines. Such common carriers are at least subject to regu-lation as "common carriers by water in foreign commerce" and may be regulated by the Com-mission with respect to items

Where a common carrier to and from United States Territories and possessions is engaged in transportation of passengers in transportation of passengers or property partly by rail and partly by water, and there is either common control of the rail carrier and the water carrier or the transportation is under an arrangement for continuous carriage or shipment, the I. C. C. has jurisdiction of the joint carriage but only insothuous carriage or snipment, the I. C. C. has jurisdiction of the joint carriage, but only insofar as such transportation takes place within the United States (Interstate Commerce Act, sec. 1). Some legal questions exist as to whether the water carriage takes place within the United States, particularly in the case of transportation to and from the Philippines. (See item (8), under column II.) The extent of the existing regulatory power of the I. C. C. is, therefore, not entirely clear. Similar I. C. C. jurisdiction also exists in the case of transportation partly by motor and partly by water where through routes and/or joint rates are established (Interstate Commerce Act, secs. 316 and 317) Commerce Act, secs. 316 and

C. C. jurisdiction. Maritime Commission jurisdiction substantially unaffected.

(4) Since Hawaii and Alaska are defined as Territories and are not foreign countries, I. C. "common carrier by water in interstate commerce." The ex-tent of such jurisdiction, if any, would in any particular case de-pend on the status of such other carrier. Since the clas-sification of carriers under sec-tion 1 of the Shipping Act, 1916, is geographical in nature and tion 1 of the Shipping Act, 1916, is geographical in nature and not based on the intrastate, interstate, or foreign character of the shipment, the jurisdiction of the Coznmission over this class of carriers is doubtful except where they become subject thereto as other persons subject to this act (Shipping Act, 1916, sec. 1) by carrying on the "business of forwarding, or furnishing, wharfage, dock, warehouse, or other terminal facilities in connection with common carriers by water in interstate or foreign commerce." Such other persons are prohibited from making false billings, etc., under section 15 and improperly divulging information under section 20. Joint rates and/or through routes with this class of carrier must be filed by the interstate or foreign water carrier involved.

NOTE 3. SUMMARY OF JURISDICTION OVER PERSONS OTHER THAN CARRIERS

NOTE 3. SUMMARY OF JURISDICTION OVER PERSONS OTHER THAN CARRIERS BY WATER

(1) Under Shipping Act, 1916, as amended, "other persons sub-(1) Under Shipping Act, 1916, as amended, "other persons subject to this act" means those carrying on the business of forwarding or furnishing wharfage, dock, or warehouse or other terminal facilities in connection with a common carrier by water (sec. 1). Such persons as well as carriers are prohibited from giving undue preferences and using unfair means to grant lower rates, from influencing insurance companies as to rates of competing water carriers. (Sec. 16.) The same section also prohibits such other persons (as well as shippers, consignors, consignees, forwarders, prokers, or other persons) from obtaining or attempting to obtain brokers, or other persons) from obtaining or attempting to obtain

by unfair means transportation by water for property at less than the rates otherwise applicable. Such other persons are also required to enforce just and reasonable regulations and practices relating to or connected with the receiving, handling, storing, or delivery of property transported by common carriers by water in foreign commerce. (Sec. 17.) As to such other persons the Commission may make an order concerning violations and award reparations to injured parties. (Secs. 22 and 23.)

(2) Under S. 2009 there are no provisions giving the I. C. C. regulatory power over persons other than carriers except brokers. Brokers of water transportation are required to obtain license therefor but brokers presently in business and who apply to the I. C. C. within 120 days after the passage of S. 2009 may continue operations until otherwise ordered by the I. C. C. The I. C. C. is given authority to prescribe reasonable rules and regulations for the protection of travelers and shippers to be observed by brokers and no license is to be issued unless the broker furnishes bond or other security in such an amount as to insure financial responsibility and supplying of transportation in accordance with agreements therefor. Carriers holding certificates or permits under the act or bona fide employees or agents of such carriers so far as concerns transportation to be furnished by such carrier or jointly with other carriers holding certificates or permits or with a common carrier by rail, express, or water are not required to obtain brokerage licenses. (Sec. 46.)

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I wish to say only a few words in conclusion.

The first question raised by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Bailey] is with reference to monopoly. I wish to call attention to the fact that, so far as I know, every single water carrier in the intercoastal trade, except those owned by monopolies, is in favor of the bill. Those subsidized by the Government and those controlled by monopolies are opposed to the bill. So far as I know, the independents are all in favor of the bill. I am speaking of the intercoastal traffic.

The American Merchant Marine Institute was represented before the committee in opposition to the bill. Only two intercoastal carriers are members of the Institute. One of them is a subsidiary of the Bethlehem Steel Co. and the other is a subsidiary of the United States Steel Corporation. The others are all engaged in international shipping, which this bill does not affect in the slightest degree, because it does not seek to regulate it.

I wish to repeat what I said with reference to the inland waterways. Representatives of the Government-owned barge line came before the committee and testified in favor of the bill, as did representatives of the Mississippi Valley Barge Line. They are two of the largest barge lines operating boats upon the Mississippi River. The representatives of both organizations stated that they favored the bill, and that they thought it would really help shipping on the Mississippi River.

In the statement which was inserted in the Record Admiral Land raised the question with reference to certificates of convenience and necessity. That question was raised when we passed the so-called bus and truck bill. It was said that the passage of that bill would create a monopoly. If we are to have regulation, whether it be regulation of utilities, regulation of railroads, regulation of busses and trucks, or regulation of water carriers, then we must have certificates of convenience and necessity. Otherwise, we cannot have proper regulation.

The shipping industry of the country is in a very deplorable situation. I have before me figures with reference to the intercoastal trade. One of the things which has brought about the present deplorable situation is the fact that after the war some ships were sold by the Government of the United States for almost nothing. They were practically given away, and were immediately put into the intercoastal business. The operators of those ships cut the rates. Some of the ships were put in international shipping, the operators receiving a subsidy from the Government. Because of the fact that such operators temporarily depressed the rates, they put out of business and "broke" many persons who were doing a legitimate business prior to that time.

The question confronting the people of the country is whether or not regulation is the proper thing. If it is the proper thing, and the country is committed to it with reference to railroads, busses, and trucks, and if we are committed to it and consider that it is the proper thing, then it cannot be said that two forms of transportation ought to be regulated and a third should be left free.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the Senator explain why aviation was omitted from the bill if the principle is to be one of uniformity of regulation as to all forms of transportation?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; I will explain that point. First, let me say that about a year ago I introduced a bill to put the regulation of air carriers under the Interstate Commerce Commission. While that bill was pending before the Interstate Commerce Committee a bill to set up a separate plan was introduced and referred to the Commerce Committee, because of the fact that subsidies were desired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not a fact that a bill setting up a separate commission had already been reported by the Interstate Commerce Committee, and had been before the Senate for consideration?

Mr. WHEELER. I think that is true. I think there was such a bill. However, it did not do exactly the same thing. Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There was some slight difference.

Mr. WHEELER. There was some difference. As a matter of fact, air carriers carry only one-tenth of 1 percent of the passenger traffic of the country; and because a new commission had just been set up we said, "We will give them a chance until air transportation becomes more important."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator certainly knows that the Maritime Commission has been set up for less than 2 years; so that argument seems to fail.

Mr. WHEELER. We did as we did principally because of the fact that air commerce amounted to comparatively little. There had been considerable agitation, and some members of the committee wanted to include air carriers. I am frank to say that I was the one who suggested that we take them out. If there is any blame or responsibility because of taking them out. I am perfectly willing to take whatever blame or responsibility there may be. I have no apologies to make to the Senator from Missouri or to anybody else for taking them out. However, with reference to water carriers, I will say that the Interstate Commerce Commission and the public authorities of the country for years have said that we ought to have a coordinated system of regulation of the different forms of transportation. The identical argument which has been made on the floor of the Senate this afternoon with reference to the farmer, and with reference to raising the rates of the railroads, busses, and trucks, was made when the bus and truck bill was pending before the committee. Not a single new argument has been advanced this afternoon or during the debate which was not advanced during the debates on the bus and truck bill. It was said, "You are going to ruin the poor farmer," and you are going to do this, that, and the other thing.

The real opposition to the bill for the regulation of water carriers comes from what source? It comes from the American Merchant Marine Institute, which is controlled, as I said, not by the independent water carriers, but by industries which have a monopoly. They want to continue to be unregulated. They want to continue to have canals dug at Government expense, and they want to operate their ships and boats through such facilities and take the money and put it in their pockets instead of passing the saving on to the consumers, exactly as the representative of the Standard Oil Co. of Kentucky testified before the Interstate Commerce Commission in a recent hearing.

I have nothing further to say with reference to this matter. I have tried to answer every question which has been propounded. We sat for 2 months, morning and evening, trying to work out the problem. We accepted every reasonable proposal which was put before us by the shipping companies, large and small, to protect their interests. We did the same thing with respect to busses and trucks. We heard representatives of bus and truck operators before the full committee, and then we heard them again before the subcommittee. We worked with them and their counsel in drafting amendments, sometimes late into the evening.

The question is, Do we want to have equal regulation for all forms of transportation? With reference to the question of raising rates, there is not a provision in the bill which authorizes the Commission in the slightest degree to raise the rates of the water carriers. On the contrary, the bill says that the Commission must recognize the inherent advantages of the different forms of transportation. The Commission has done so with reference to busses and trucks. The bus and truck operators, who bitterly complained when we first passed the so-called Bus and Truck Act, are now in favor of such regulation, and they would not go back to the old scramble which previously existed. We will find that the same thing will happen with reference to those who operate ships, except, of course, the big industrial owners of boats who want free transportation and who do not want to pay the Government anything for it.

We have heard much about monopoly. Who is monopolizing the rivers? Is it the little fellow? Is it the little shipper? Oh, no. Those who are monopolizing the riversmake no mistake about it-are the steel, coal, and oil interests. They are the ones who are receiving the benefit of water transportation, and they are putting the money in their own pockets, as the representative of the Standard Oil Co. of Kentucky said.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has stated, with his usual clarity and candor, that the real overpowering question is whether or not we shall establish regulation or control or whether we shall try to preserve competition where it seems practicable.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. That is the question as I see it. We have been debating that matter for 30 years and have always advocated the preservation of water transportation as a matter of competition. The question is, Must we give it up? That question will be settled in this bill, in my judgment, and we will have disposed of it. We go to control for our entire transportation and cut out all natural competition.

I am quite aware that, as the Senator has well said, the real control of the rivers is passing in some respect into the hands of what might be called monopoly; but is there no way to preserve competition by destroying monopoly? Of course, if we permit monopoly to control these resources in which we thought the people had a natural interest and which we thought would be of service to them, then all we have left is regulation; and that is sometimes merely another form of monopoly.

That is correct. Mr. WHEELER.

Mr. BORAH. So the fight here is just as it is everywhere else on this subject, namely, whether we are going to submit to monopolistic control in their different aspects of services which have been brought into existence through the efforts of the people and were intended to benefit the people but which have passed into the hands of monopoly, and therefore no longer serve the people. Everything points back to the question whether or not we will undertake to control the monopolies of this country.

I agree entirely that if we are going to have regulation and control it will, in time at least, cover all transportation agencies unless we can create a condition which will make for independence upon the part of the water carriers. That is, in my judgment, our task here.

The Senator from Montana and the other able Senators who have worked upon this proposed legislation have certainly done a great piece of work, if we are to consider the policy as settled; but the real question is not a question to be decided by individual Senators in perfecting a bill. The question is one of policy, which ought to be decided by the Senate, as to whether or not we are going to surrender the competitive system which exists or should exist relative to the water carriers of this country.

Mr. WHEELER. I agree with the Senator, but I submit that we are not in the slightest degree surrendering the competition that exists with the water carriers of the country today. We are regulating competition between the various common carriers by water just the same as today we are regulating competition between the railroads. There is nothing in this proposed legislation that does not recognize absolutely that there should be competition between the water carrier on the one hand and the railroad on the other, and there is nothing in it that fails to recognize that there must be competition between the bus and the truck on the one hand and the railroad on the other.

I have in this body fought for the last 10 or 15 years against the efforts of the railroads to repeal the fourth section. Why did they want to repeal it? So that they could cut their rates when they came in competition with the water carrier.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President may I ask the Senator a question there?

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Is there anything in the terms of this bill, or will there be anything in the operation of the bill, if it should become a law, which would affect in any way section 4?

Mr. WHEELER. No. We have preserved section 4 as it is at the present time. The only thing we did with reference to section 4 was done in accordance with the suggestion made by Mr. Campbell, who has led the fight for the intermountain territory. We took out the so-called equidistance clause. That action will not affect the situation in the western section. The so-called equidistance clause is a matter that the Interstate Commerce Commission and practically everyone else has said is unworkable and does not amount to anything. The action taken, however, does not affect the so-called long-and-short-haul provision of the law.

The only other change we made was also suggested by Mr. Campbell and others from the Northwest. They said they were perfectly agreeable to having incorporated in the bill a provision to the effect that when an application was filed and there was no objection or opposition to it the Commission could put the rate applied for into operation at the time the application was filed. If there was opposition, then the Commission would suspend the time when the rates would go into effect until after hearings. Everyone agreed that that provision was entirely satisfactory.

So far as I am personally concerned with reference to this measure, I have tried to do, and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN], and every other member of the committee has tried to do, what I thought and what they thought was a conscientious job and to treat the water carriers fairly. If that is not done, then there is only one other alternative.

If we do not believe in regulation for the waterways, then we have got to say that we do not believe in regulation for the railroads, because the water carriers today-and let us make no mistake about that-engage in the same kind of practices, including rebates and discriminations, that the railroads engaged in until Congress provided for the regulation of the railroads. The water carriers still do all those things, and they are not regulated and do not want to be

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator tell us where that is in the record? Who has told the Senator that? Where is the testimony?

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that it is common knowledge that the water carriers charge one rate here and another rate there and another rate some place else. They are openly doing it. It is admitted by some of the water carriers that that is happening. It is also being done and has been done by contract carriers. The contract carriers are all doing it. They charge one rate, a discriminating rate, to one man and another rate to another man.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is a different matter.

Mr. WHEELER. But that is discrimination, and that is what was complained of on the part of the railroads.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is done all over the world. Carriers bid for cargoes. If a carrier has an empty boat and anyone wants carriage, the water carriers will all bid for that cargo, and the freight will go to the lowest bidder.

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly. The common carriers are all doing the same thing; and they justify it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President-

Mr. WHEELER. Wait a moment. Some of them have admitted to me that they have done it and are doing it. I am not complaining about that, but I am saying, if we are not going to regulate water carriers, then let us repeal the fourth section; let us permit the railroads to compete openly and brazenly and cut their rates to any point they desire when they come in competition with water carriers.

I have fought single-handed to preserve the fourth section. Twice a bill passed the House of Representatives almost unanimously to repeal the fourth section, and it would have passed the Senate—as I found, because I checked on it—if it had ever been reported by the committee and reached the floor of the Senate. What would that have done? Thrown open absolute competition between them, and it would have put all the small water carriers out of business. They protested against the repeal, and I agreed with jhem. I suggested at that time, and I have repeatedly suggested since, that that was not the solution of the problem; that what we ought to do was to regulate the water carriers upon the same basis as other carriers.

When I say "the same basis" I do not mean to apply the same rates but recognizing the inherent advantages of water transportation, the inherent advantages of bus and truck transportation, and the inherent advantages of railroad transportation. If we desire a unified transportation system, that is what we have got to do; and if we do not want such a transportation system, then let us repeal the law providing for the regulation of railroads, and turn them free.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I can bear witness to the work the Senator from Montana did with reference to section 4. I am perfectly satisfied that if it had not been for the efforts put forth by the Senator the bill to which he has referred would have passed the Senate. But if we place the regulation of the railroads under the same Commission and the same authority as we place the regulation of water transportation and depend alone upon what are called the inherent advantages for the purpose of distinguishing the water rates from the railroad rates, is it not almost a certainty that in a very short time there will be very little distinction between the rates of the two services?

Mr. WHEELER. I think the Senator is wrong.

Mr. BORAH. The railroads will present their case as to the necessity of this rate and that rate, and they will make the water carriers conform to their necessity.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator is entirely wrong about that. Let me say to the Senator that argument was made with reference to the busses and trucks. The bus and truck interests said, "The Commission is railroad-minded, and that is what is going to happen." The railroads now say that the Commission has been too free and has leaned away over toward the busses and trucks.

I do not know whether or not the Senator voted for the Transportation Act of 1920. Under that act, however, the trouble was not with the Commission but was with the Congress of the United States, because the Congress of the United States did what the Supreme Court said:

The new act seeks affirmatively to build up a system of railways prepared to handle promptly all the interstate traffic of the country.

All of it.

It aims to give the owners of railways an opportunity to earn enough to maintain their properties and equipment in such a state of efficiency that they can carry well this burden—

That is, carry all the traffic to achieve this great purpose. Says the Supreme Court:

It puts the railroad systems of the country more completely than ever under the fostering guardianship and control of the Commission.

That is what the Congress did.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I know what the Congress did, and I know what the Commission has been doing.

Mr. WHEELER. The Commission could not do otherwise: but let me say to the Senator that in 1933 that law was repealed and amended. Today, if the Senator will look at the language used in this bill, he will see that there is not a possibility of doing away with competition if the Commission is honest, and I think it is at the present time. I think at the present time we have one of the best Interstate Commerce Commissions we have ever had, because it has been liberalized, and there are some very excellent men on it. If the Commission carries out this law, there will be competition between water carriers and railroads, and there will be competition between trucks and busses and railroads, because so far as protecting competition between them is concerned certainly no law could be written that is plainer; and at no time has anyone suggested in the committee any provision that should be put into the bill that would better assure competition than the provision we have in it. There has not been a single suggestion by anybody, by the water carriers or anybody else, to give any stronger or any better assurance of competition than we have in the bill.

Mr. BORAH. We come back to the proposition that the entire transportation system of the United States—railroads, water transportation, and all other transportation—is going to pass into the hands and under the control of one commission.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. Our entire 130,000,000 people, with all of their transportation systems bearing upon different phases of our economic life, are to be controlled and guided and directed by a single commission. All the competition which comes into play by reason of natural conditions, of which Europe made so much in earlier days and of which we hoped to make so much, is eliminated. Now, I am well aware of the situation of the railroads, they need help and must have it, but I do not feel it is fair to the people to remove the great competitive water transportation system. The entire matter is passing into the hands of a single commission: and what will the shipper out in the Northwest do when he finds a situation in which he thinks he ought to have a different rate with reference to water transportation? He must come to Washington to fight it out here with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that he now has to come here.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that; but is it wise, is it well, to eliminate the natural competition which must necessarily continue to exist?

Mr. WHEELER. It has already been eliminated. The question is not whether we are eliminating it in this bill; it has already been done except as to the Mississippi River Line. We have eliminated it everywhere else. The Congress did it at the last session.

What we have here is the question whether or not we are going to leave the regulation of these water carriers in the Maritime Commission. Does the Senator from Idaho for one moment think that if I own a boat and he owns a boat, and he is being subsidized and I am not being subsidized, I would want to have the Maritime Commission pass upon the rates I would be able to charge, especially when the Maritime Commission is also operating lines of its own?

All we are doing in this legislation is to transfer the regulatory powers from the Maritime Commission to the Interstate Commerce Commission. That is what we are seeking to do. So the argument the Senator made a moment ago about doing away with competition refers to something that is gone anyway, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, since listening to the Senator yesterday and today with reference to the Maritime Commission, I assure him I have no desire to send anything there; but there is such a thing as repealing the law and changing the program in that respect.

Mr. WHEELER. I should like to see somebody try it, but it will not be possible to do it at the present time.

Mr. BORAH. Probably not. But that fails to convince me that we should prepare for the final surrender of a competitive water transportation system. It can certainly be made of service in protecting the shippers and producers of the country.

Mr. WHEELER. But all the shippers with whom I have come in contact have said to me that all they want is to be regulated by a fair and an impartial body. They feel satisfied to go before the Interstate Commerce Commission, a quasi judicial body, with its set of experts who are familiar with rate-making. They have repeatedly come to me and said, "We are willing to go before that body; but we do not want to go before a body that has subsidized our competitors on the one hand, and runs ships of its own in competition with us on the other."

I submit the matter to the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have no desire to delay a vote on the pending question. I do wish, however, to say just a word in regard to the proposed legislation.

The question of taxing some action with regard to the railroad situation is one that has been agitating both branches of Congress and the country for the past 2 or 3 years. Nobody, I believe, can claim to have the last word on what ought to be done about the railroads. I remember that nearly 20 years ago I was a Member of the House and a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce when we passed the Transportation Act. For over 6 weeks I sat in the conference between the two Houses, trying to adjust the difference between the Esch bill in the House and the Cummins bill in the Senate, the measure later becoming popularly known as the Esch-Cummins Act or the Transportation Act.

In that act we made a stagger toward dealing with our transportation problem as a whole. We went a good way in coordinating the transportation systems by rail, and under the authority of the Shreveport case we went a long way in coordinating interstate and intrastate carriers and transportation systems. We also took a considerable step in coordinating rail and water transportation by providing for certain regulation of through routes and other things pertaining to both rail and water transportation.

I was a member of the committee of the Senate which framed the Bus and Truck Act; and it was a hard thing to harmonize the differences among owners of that form of transportation, and between them and the railroads. Finally, legislation was enacted placing bus and truck transportation under the Interstate Commerce Commission for the purposes of regulation.

I should be the last man in this body or anywhere to do anything that would in any way cripple water transportation, or put it at a disadvantage, or destroy it. I am anxious to help the railroads in any legitimate way; but I am not sufficiently anxious to help them to be induced to destroy any other form of transportation in order to do so.

I live on the Ohio River, at the mouth of the Tennessee. I have traveled by steamboat up and down the Mississippi, the Ohio, the Tennessee, and the Cumberland in days when there were steamboats on those rivers. The steamboat as a means of transportation on those inland waterways practically went out of business. It may be said that the railroads drove them out of business, just as the railroads drove the stagecoach out of business. One reason why it was possible was that there were not annual, year-round transportation facilities through having sufficient depth of water to enable steamboats to run all the year, rather than to be tied up in some port for half the time, and as the steamboats wore out and became useless, men with money refused to invest their money in other steamboats that could operate only half the time. So, by one process or another, steamboat transportation almost completely disappeared from our inland waterways, and it has not yet been restored.

We in Congress have voted for the improvement of our rivers and harbors. More than a quarter of a century ago Congress passed a law which established a policy with respect to the Ohio River by which it promised ultimately to provide for a 9-foot stage from Pittsburgh to Cairo, Ill., the entire year around, so that men who wanted to engage in that form of transportation would be induced to invest their money in it. That system has been completed. I have been in favor of it, and I am now in favor of it, and I hope some day to see steamboats restored to that great river, which traverses one of the richest and most fertile parts of our country, and which is lined with industrial activities on both its north and its south banks.

Therefore, I have an interest in water transportation. I should not want to destroy it; I do not want to eliminate it; and I think it would be a short-sighted policy for Congress to spend the millions of dollars which have been spent in canalizing the rivers and then by any law destroy the possibility of water transportation upon them. Yet I realize that as our life, commercial and otherwise, becomes more complex there must be constantly an increase in the matter of Government regulation. It may be a regrettable fact, but it is a fact which I think we must face, that as life becomes more complex the intercourse of one section with another by various modes of communication and the transportation of human beings and freight and intelligence across this country and throughout the world become more complex, and so we cannot avoid the necessity of coordination and regulation.

I recall that a committee of which I was a member, under the leadership of the distinguished junior Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE], who sits before me, and the Senator from Washington, Mr. Dill, who was a Member of the Senate at that time, reported and the Senate passed what was known as the Radio Act, a law regulating radio, creating the Radio Commission, authorizing it alone to deal with radio transmission. But it was not long before we found that we had to include all forms of transmission of information, the telegraph, and the telephone, and the wireless. however unrelated they may have been in their inception and origin and even in their methods. We finally established a Communications Commission in place of the Radio Commission to have control and regulation of all forms of transmission of information, intelligence, and so on, by wire or wireless, or by any other method known to the genius of man. I think that was a wise step. I think there has been no general complaint because of the fact that we consolidated the regulation of these various means of transmission.

When the bus and the truck came along as competitors with the railroads, occupying the highways, complaint was made against this form of transportation, which was in a way subsidized by the States or the Federal Government, or both combined, in that from tax money highways were built which the busses and the trucks used freely. That complaint was well founded; but that offered no reason, in my opinion, for attempting to destroy bus and truck lines. It is not possible to build a permanent barrier against the progress of the human mind, and, however many laws may be passed in an attempt to stifle some sort of competition which comes about by new inventions, it cannot be done. Human progress overrides such barriers and moves on. We found it necessary to regulate the busses and trucks by putting them under the Interstate Commerce Commission.

If there is to be any coordination in our regulation of transportation or means of commerce in this country, I think the same thing will happen with respect to water and rail and highway transportation, and whether the time has come when aviation should be included in this attempted regulation under the same authority, I do not know. I myself would not have any objection to including aviation under the terms of the bill; but it is not in the bill, and I do not intend to seek to have it put in.

I see before me the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Clark], who lives just across the Mississippi River from my home in the great Midwest, and who is much interested in transportation by water. Interested as I have been in all my activities in both Houses of Congress in seeking to encourage transportation of water, and desiring not only to preserve but to increase it, I do not see how the pending bill strikes any blow at water transportation, because it does not require the Interstate Commerce Commission, in establishing regulations and in fixing any rates for water transportation, to use the same methods or the same facts as a basis for the fixing of rates on water as they use for fixing rates on rails or on trucks. If I am mistaken in that. I should like to have the chairman of the committee correct me.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Has it not occurred to the Senator that the section of the country from which he and I hail, to wit, the Mississippi Valley, simply has not been able to muster sufficient show of strength to be traded with? Aviation, by reason of the great amount of romance and public interest and propaganda connected with the development of aviation, has been excluded from the operation of the bill. The Great Lakes are excluded, because they have been able to bring sufficient pressure to bear on the floor to be excluded, and it really comes down to the fact that the Mississippi Valley is simply not sufficiently important to be traded with by the committee.

Mr. BARKLEY. Much as I respect the Senator from Missouri and his sincerity, I should not be willing to admit, or even to think, that legislation of this importance is a matter of horse-swapping or trading back and forth between various sorts of transportation. If there has been any trading going on, I have not been in on it, I will say.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The results are perfectly

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not believe there has been any of the sort of back scratching and horse swapping and mule trading that occurs on county court day in Missouri and Kentucky, in order to get this legislation on the floor.

In conclusion, I wish to congratulate the Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED], and all other Senators who have had a part in framing the legislation. I am a member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, but, to my great regret and to my infinite loss, my other duties have made it impossible for me to devote the attention to the framing of this measure I have heretofore devoted in both Houses to the framing of legislation dealing with transportation.

All the Senators who have taken part in framing the pending bill have done a conscientious job. We all understand that it is difficult to work out a transportation policy in legislation. I dare say that the railroads are not getting all they would like to have in the bill; the bus interests may not be getting all they would like to have; water transportation may be making some concessions; but, if we are to have a united, coordinated, sensible system of transportation in this country, it seems to me the pending bill now offers the best vehicle possible, in view of the limitations under which

As a member of the committee, I appreciate the conscientious work which has been done by the members of the subcommittee in bringing the proposed legislation to the floor, and the intelligence with which they have presented it to the Senate. I believe that when the bill is enacted it will result in great good to the country and to better feeling. and that it will establish a better system in our transportation throughout the Nation.

For the reasons I have given I am constrained to vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina to eliminate all water transportation regulation under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I intend to vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Balley], although I would have very much preferred to vote for the motion which the Senator from North Carolina originally intended to make, to refer the bill to the Committee on Commerce for the consideration of the question of water-borne transportation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield. Mr. BARKLEY. I find, in the last moment or two, that there is a good deal of confusion among Senators as to what the pending question is. Having advance knowledge that the Senator from North Carolina intended to move to refer the bill to the Committee on Commerce, some Senators have thought that was the motion now pending.

The pending motion is not to refer the bill to the Committee on Commerce but to strike out certain provisions with respect to water transportation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is correct. I have a copy of the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina. His proposal is to insert a new section at the proper place in the bill, as follows:

All forms of water transportation, except joint rail-and-water rates, are hereby excepted and exempted from the operations of this act.

Mr. President, as I have said, I intend to vote for the amendment, although I would very much have preferred to vote for the motion which the Senator from North Carolina originally intended to offer, to refer the bill to the Committee on Commerce, where, in my opinion, the jurisdiction originally belonged, for the purpose of consideration of the question of water-borne transportation.

Mr. President, this is perhaps the most remarkable attempt that has taken place in the Senate during my service by one standing committee absolutely to raid the jurisdiction of another standing committee, and actually to usurp one of the most important features of its jurisdiction. From time immemorial in this body the question of water-borne commerce has been within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Commerce. The maritime bill, creating the Maritime Commission, was reported from the Committee on Commerce. So far as I know, all bills having to do with maritime affairs from time immemorial have been within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Commerce and have been reported from that committee.

The Committee on Commerce not only reported the bill providing for the improvement of the inland waterways of the country and the harbors of the country but also reported the bill authorizing the creation of the Inland Waterways Corporation, and has always retained jurisdiction over the operations of that Corporation.

Without exception that has been the rule of the Senate ever since the subject of waterways has been before it, which is ever since the Committee on Commerce was originally created.

The Committee on Interstate Commerce, which has undoubted jurisdiction of the question of railroads, now comes forward and assumes jurisdiction of the question of water transportation, both in intercoastal shipping and as regards inland waterways.

Mr. President, it may be said that the question of committee jurisdiction is of slight importance in contradistinction to the importance of the pending legislation; but I submit that the committee which has always had jurisdiction of the question of water-borne commerce, the committee which had jurisdiction of the legislation setting up the Maritime Commission and the Inland Waterways Corporation, and particularly had jurisdiction of the legislation during the long struggle on the part of the great inland empire, the Mississippi Valley, for access to the sea, for escape from railroad monopolistic domination-I submit that that committee is entitled to have an opportunity of discussing the features of the bill as it affects the inland waterways transportation for which we have struggled so long.

Mr. President, much has been said about the attitude of the water carriers. So far as I am concerned, I wish to say that the water carriers are entitled to be heard, just as the railroads are entitled to be heard or anyone else is entitled to be heard; but the interest which should concern us is not the interest of the water carriers; it is not the interest of the railroads; it is the interest of the great American shipping

My objection to the bill, Mr. President, as I said day before yesterday and as I repeated yesterday, is that it turns the water transportation of our country over to a commission which, by its very constitution, by its history, and by the whole body of its precedents, is a railroad-minded commission. We are putting water transportation into the hands of a hostile body, and we might as well recognize right now that when we do that we are possibly sounding the death knell of water transportation, at least so far as the inland waterways of the country are concerned.

Mr. President, I remember a conversation which I heard years ago when I was a small boy between my father and James J. Hill, one of the great railroad men of the country, called, and properly called, "The Great Empire Builder," a man for whom my father had a great admiration, a man whom no one could meet without being impressed. He described how, when he first built the Great Northern to the Pacific coast, much difficulty arose because of the lack of freight consignments in return to the East. There was no trouble in loading their trains to go West, but they had nothing to bring East. However, by making a very low rate they built up a trade in shingles and other products which made the line profitable.

My father finally asked Mr. Hill, "Does water competition bother you at all?" Mr. Hill said, "No, no. At one time it did. There used to be many steamboats on the Missouri River that handled a great deal of traffic. They are practically all gone." And he chuckled and said, "What are left we own ourselves."

Mr. President, I do not want to see the inland waterway transportation of the United States placed in any danger of being subjected to competition by the railroads which will possibly cause that service, so vitally necessary to the people of the Middle West, to be wiped out.

I have no objection to the regulation of the inland waterway transportation of the country; I certainly have no objection to the regulation of the intercoastal shipping of the country; but I do object to taking that water-borne traffic transportation and turning it over to a commission whose body of precedents necessarily makes it railroad-minded. As I said the other day, by that statement I mean to cast no reflection on any of the present or past personnel of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Two or three years ago I objected to some of the decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission which I thought discriminated against water transportation on the inland waterways, and when the Commissioner who had written the opinions to which I objected was reappointed I proposed to hold up the confirmation of his nomination as long as I could. He came to see me, brought with him a set of the precedents of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and pointed out to me that under the body of precedents of that Commission he could not do anything different from what he had done. He convinced me that he was right. As I said, I intend no reflection on any member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, past or present, when I say that we are turning the water transportation of the country over to a railroad-minded body.

Mr. President, I realize the terrific difficulty from a practical standpoint in opposing a measure which has the active support of the Railroad Executives Association of the United States and of the Railroad Brotherhoods of the United States. Taken as a whole, those who are interested in water transportation, the farmers and the shippers of the Mississippi Valley, are inarticulate in this body and elsewhere in comparison with the great organizations of railroad executives and railroad employees.

As I said yesterday, I have no hostility to the railroads. I think legislation for the relief of the railroads should be enacted by the Senate, whether the railroads are responsible, as I believe they are themselves, for very much of their present predicament, or whether they are not; but so long as they are a vital transportation necessity, they ought to be fostered and taken care of, but they ought not to be fostered at the expense of those sections of the country which depend upon and are entitled to depend on water transportation to offset the geographical disadvantage of not being on the seacoast.

Therefore, Mr. President, while, as I said, I should very much prefer to have the opportunity of voting for a motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Commerce, since the chairman of the Committee on Commerce has seen fit to offer the pending amendment, instead of offering the motion to refer, I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I desire to say one word with reference to the statement made concerning the lack of jurisdiction on the part of the Interstate Commerce Committee. After all, the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce has jurisdiction over interstate commerce; and if the matter now under discussion is not regulation of interstate commerce, then I do not know what interstate commerce is.

Mr. President, had the Commerce Committee wished to take the matter over and handle it, I should have been delighted to let that committee handle it, or let any other committee handle it, because I did not want to do it. The only reason I did it was because I was requested to do so by the President; and if I was going to handle it, I had to handle it in the Interstate Commerce Committee.

What I did do, which perhaps the Senator does not know, is that I went to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce and said to him, "If you will appoint a subcommittee when the bill comes up I shall be glad to have a subcommittee of the Committee on Commerce and a subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate Commerce go into the matter. The Senator was ill and left town, and when I went to his office I was told he had not returned, and his office employees did not know when he was coming back. I had to go ahead with the hearings, and I went ahead with the hearings. Those are

As a matter of fact, the Commerce Committee, as distinguished from the Interstate Commerce Committee, has nothing to do with interstate commerce.

Mr. BAILEY entered the Chamber.

Mr. WHEELER. I now repeat what I said while the Senator from North Carolina was out of the Chamber. I said that when the bill was first introduced I went to the chairman of the Commerce Committee and suggested to him that I would work out with him an arrangement for a subcommittee of his committee and a subcommittee of the Interstate Commerce Committee to meet together, and if he so desired we would hold joint hearings with reference to the bill. I went back to his office and was informed that the Senator was out of the city, and those in his office did not know when he would return. I had to go ahead with the hearings, and I went ahead with the hearings under those circumstances.

I repeat, if the chairman of the Commerce Committee had come to me at any time and said, "I should like to handle the bill," I should very gladly have withdrawn my name from it and turned it over to the chairman of the Commerce Committee and permitted him to handle it. It is a significant fact that only after the Interstate Commerce Committee has worked for 3 solid months on the bill, after I have done more work on it than I have ever done on any other piece of legislation that has come before the committee, and at the last minute, when we are about to vote on it, the committee is criticized because it is said we are usurping the powers of the Commerce Committee. I do not want to let that statement go unanswered.

In addition, there were recommendations in the committee's report which I said I should not handle, because they properly belonged to the Commerce Committee. However, the regulation of interstate rates is a matter which belongs to the Interstate Commerce Committee. If the Commerce Committee itself or the chairman of the Commerce Committee had said to me, "We should like to handle it", I should gladly have turned the matter over to them. I am not interested in bills, and I am not interested in having my name attached to legislation. I have never found it necessary to do that sort of thing or to insist on legislation coming before my committee. Other committees, particularly the Commerce Committee, have taken jurisdiction of legislation which I thought belonged to the Interstate Commerce Committee; but I have never raised my voice in protest, either on the floor of the Senate or otherwise, publicly or privately. I have said, "If they want to handle the bill, I am delighted to let them handle it."

I do not think the people of the country are interested in whether the Commerce Committee or the Interstate Commerce Committee handles a bill. What they are interested in is the kind of legislation which comes from the Congress.

I would not for one moment have taken any legislation away from the Commerce Committee if I had thought my good friend Joe Bailey, or the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Clark], or anybody else on that committee, wanted it. I deliberately suggested that there were many matters in the recommendations of the committee which ought to go to the Commerce Committee. A bill has come to the Interstate Commerce Committee which properly belongs in the Commerce Committee. I refer to the bill with reference to the Inland Waterways Corporation itself. That bill belongs before the Commerce Committee. I have suggested to the author of the bill that it belongs to the Commerce Committee, and I intend to have it referred to the Commerce

Other bills have come before the Interstate Commerce Committee which, if somebody had raised the question, might well have been referred to some other committee. However, many times the line of demarcation between the jurisdiction of one committee and that of another is so close that I have heard very little debate on the floor of the Senate with reference to the question. We have had monetary legislation before the Agricultural Committee. We have had before the Agricultural Committee all kinds of legislation which did not have much to do with agriculture except in an indirect way.

I am sorry this matter was brought up. I must confess that I do not think it has anything to do with the merits or demerits of the bill.

Again, with reference to the Interstate Commerce Commission, the statement has been made that it is going to raise rates. I shall not take the time of the Senate again to discuss that question. If the Senate believes that the Interstate Commerce Commission is so corrupt, so crooked, and so unintelligent that it is not the proper commission to handle the matter, and that it ought to be left with the Maritime Commission, so far as I am concerned it is all right with me. It is a question for the Senate to determine.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, perhaps the statement made by my friend the senior Senator from Montana might suggest to some Senators that a statement from me would be in order.

There will never be any difficulty between the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee and the chairman of the Commerce Committee so long as the present chairmen are in their positions. My regard for the Senaor from Montana is entirely too high for me ever to raise any question of jealousy or even suggest anything in the nature of a complaint. I believe I can take to myself the assurance that he is my friend.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. BAILEY. So we shall not have any trouble about that.

When this matter first came up, some time in March, I brought it to the attention of the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee.

Mr. WHEELER. I think I brought it to the Senator's attention.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator says he brought it to my attention. Perhaps he did. I will agree to that. My recollection is indefinite. At any rate, at its first appearance it seemed that the bill might be divided, in which event the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce said that the water transportation features would be submitted to the Committee on Commerce. Later he informed me that that course seemed to be impracticable. It then occurred to both of us that probably the best thing to do would be to have the Commerce Committee appoint a subcommittee of five and the Interstate Commerce Committee appoint a subcommittee of five. I think that was the understanding. I think that was a matter in our minds.

On the 30th of March I engaged to make a speech in North Carolina. I made the speech and remained in the State 5 or 6 or 7 days. When I returned the hearings were proceeding on the whole bill before the Interstate Commerce Committee.

A little later the matter came up between the Senator from Montana and myself, and he stated to me that he had looked for me during my absence with a view to having me appoint five members of the Commerce Committee, but that he had not found me in the city, and so he had proceeded. At the time of that conversation he expressed the view that it probably was too late to take up the matter.

That circumstance has not raised any feeling on my part and will not raise any feeling. I think the bill should have been referred in the first instance to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I have never raised any question on that score. I did think the Commerce Committee should pass upon the matter. I gave notice of my motion. However, in the course of the debate I decided that I would submit the matter on its actual merits to the Senate and file all the data that were available to me, and that I have done.

So far as I am concerned now, I want the vote to be on the merits of the question, and I wish to give all manner of assurance that I am incapable of being actuated by jealousy of that sort. There is never going to be any trouble of that character so long as I am chairman of the Committee on Commerce.

I am also incapable of thinking anything in derogation of the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I am his friend. I have great reason to be his friend, and I think all the Senate has the utmost confidence in him.

Let that go just as it is. I am satisfied with the situation as it is; and, so far as I am concerned, I am ready to take a vote on the merits.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Balley].

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I should be glad if the amendment could be stated, because there are some Senators who may not be familiar with its terms.

LXXXIV-389

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to insert, at the proper place in the bill, a new section to read as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina. Mr. BAILEY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McNARY (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. Schwellenbach], and therefore withhold my vote. If the Senator from Washington were present and voting, he would vote "nay," and if I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BYRD. My colleague [Mr. Glass] is absent because of illness. On this question I am informed that if he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. In view of the fact that if present he would vote as I have voted, I will let my vote stand.

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Smith] is detained from the Senate because of illness in his family.

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is absent on official business for the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. Schwellenbach] is unavoidably detained.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Bilbo], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Donahey], the Senator from California [Mr. Downey], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Logan], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Thomas], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Van Nuys] are detained on important public business.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. Typings] is addressing the Iron Institute in New York City today, an engagement which he made more than 4 months ago, and is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Logan]. I am advised that if present and voting, the Senator from Maryland would vote "yea," and the Senator from Kentucky would vote "nay."

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce the general pair of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS].

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 57, as follows:

So Mr. Balley's amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate and open to further amendment.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the bill, it is proposed to add the following new section:

SEC. — Subsection (a) of section 5 of the act entitled "An act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes," approved September 26, 1914, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"For the purposes of this act, it shall be deemed to be an unfair or deceptive act or practice in commerce for any person, partner-ship, or corporation to so fix the price at point of destination of any goods or commodities transported in commerce that such price includes a charge for transportation, based upon railroad rates, for any part of the transportation of such goods or commodities which was not conducted by railroad."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, this amendment is designed to put an end to the vicious practices of monopolistic corporations which are using public waterways. Those practices have been denounced on the floor of the Senate by the very able Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler] and also by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED]. At this late hour I do not want to take up the time of the Senate in discussing the amendment fully, because I know the Senate desires to adjourn. However, I desire to have a record vote on the amendment.

The chairman of the committee, the Senator from Montana, has stated that he would help me get a record vote on the question of monopoly. We have been studying monopoly for years and years, and complaining about it. There are flagrant examples of monopolistic practices mulcting the people through the use of our waterways by not giving to the public the benefit of cheap water transportation.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield. Mr. WHEELER. I should be very glad to have the Senator obtain a record vote. There is only one thing I wish to say: The amendment was just brought in this afternoon, and I have not had a chance to study it to any extent, and no one has had a chance to give it any consideration. I do not know that the Members of the Senate know what the amendment is. I think the Senator should explain it. has presented an amendment which proposes to amend the Federal Trade Commission Act. It is proposed at the end of the bill to add a new section. It is very important and very far-reaching. I am in thorough accord with the principle involved, but the amendment has just been offered, and I have never seen it before, and it has to do with a question on which no hearings have been had. It is proposed to add the following at the end of the bill:

Subsection (a) of section 5 of the act entitled "An act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes," approved September 26, 1914, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:
"For the purposes of this act"—

Which would mean the Federal Trade Commission Act-"it shall be deemed to be an unfair or deceptive act or practice in commerce for any person, partnership, or corporation to so fix the price at point of destination of any goods or commodities transported in commerce that such price includes a charge for transportation, based upon railroad rates, for any part of the transportation of such goods or commodities which was not conducted by railroad." ducted by railroad.'

I have not had a chance to study the amendment. At first glance it seems to me there might be a loophole where it says "so fix the price at the point of destination." But perhaps that is all right. The amendment relates to an extremely important matter. I do not think the pending bill is the measure to which it should be attached, but I do think in principle it is absolutely correct.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield for a question?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I confess that I know so little about the general subject of fixing rates, and about the practice of the Interstate Commerce Commission under the law, that I cannot satisfy myself as to whether this proposal is in conflict with the Interstate Commerce Commission Act as we propose to codify and amend it by the pending legislation.

It occurs to me that the amendment would nullify a rate, and, more than that, make it offensive for a transportation company to charge a rate which was approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and therefore that we would be here legislating in diametrically opposing directions. I wish to ask the Senator whether he has sufficiently investigated the effect of his amendment to know whether it might or might not conflict with the legislation to which he wishes

Before taking my seat I wish to say that there is so little information regarding it that I myself cannot agree to the amendment, and I might, on thorough study, wish to change my attitude with respect to the bill itself if the amendment should be attached to it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. REED. I am in entire sympathy with the objective of the distinguished Senator from Minnesota, but the amendment is proposed to a bill which has to do with the regulation of transportation in interstate commerce, and not with the fixing of prices. The Interstate Commerce Commission, the body to which is delegated all the authority under the pending bill, could not possibly reach the end sought by the Senator from Minnesota.

I beg the Senator from Minnesota to permit me to suggest that if he will offer this as an amendment to the Federal Trade Commission Act I shall be very happy to give him my assistance; but I do not think it properly belongs in the pending bill, and I hope the Senator from Minnesota will not press for its inclusion in this bill. I only make the suggestion because I do not think this is the place for it. If the Senator will be good enough to bring it back in proper form, I shall be very happy to give him what assistance I can, which is only one vote in this body, to have his amendment enacted into law.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I thank the Senator. I may say to the Senator from Vermont that he is laboring under a misappre-The amendment has nothing to do with the rates fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission for rail or water, except when an industry transports its own freight on a boat on a public waterway, which it can do for from one-sixth to one-tenth of the rail rate, and frequently the industry charges the full rate by rail. I think it is a very reprehensible practice that the public highways should be used to enrich a monopoly, and not have the public get the benefit of the waterways which have been developed by the expenditure of the taxpayers' money for the benefit of the public.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Montana has impressed us with the seriousness and importance of this amendment. It is very evident that the Senator from Minnesota thinks it is important. It is now 20 minutes past 5 o'clock, and he should have full time to discuss and present his views on the amendment. I suggest to the leaders on both sides that provision be made to give the Senator that opportunity tomorrow, and also give the Senator from Montana opportunity to study the amendment. It is quite evident we cannot get through tonight.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I was about to offer a suggestion to the Senator from Minnesota, if he will yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The proposed amendment is an amendment to the Federal Trade Commission Act, dealing with unfair practices and monopolies.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes. Mr. BARKLEY. There is a joint committee now engaged in considering the whole subject of monopolies, amendments to the Federal Trade Commission Act, and the entire subject, and I have no doubt that they would give sympathetic consideration to any statement the Senator would make to the committee on this subject. I agree with the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Montana that it really injects a new subject here which has no immediate relationship to the question of transportation, or the fixing of rates, and there is nothing the Interstate Commerce Commission could do about the provisions of the Senator's amendment. It would give them no jurisdiction, but would merely add a paragraph or section to the Federal Trade Commission Act.

Does not the Senator feel that this important amendment would receive more careful consideration if it were presented to the joint committee, or offered as an independent bill and referred to the committee, or to some other committee, than at this time, during the consideration of the pending bill, to inject this new subject, which has no real relationship to transpotration?

Mr. WHEELER. If I may make a suggestion to the Senator, I do not feel that the amendment has any place on this particular bill, because it relates to the Federal Trade Commission. The Senator is seeking to amend the Federal Trade Commission Act by attaching an amendment to the pending bill. I do not like that idea. But if the Senator will offer the amendment as a separate measure, it will come to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and I will immediately appoint the Senator from Minnesota as chairman of the subcommittee to give the matter consideration. It is of sufficient importance, it seems to me, if we are to enact legislation of this kind, and do a good job, not to offer something which may perhaps be full of loopholes, and pass it hastily. I think it would be unfortunate if we adopted something hastily without giving it consideration or having a hearing on it. It is immaterial to me, but I could not support the amendment as an amendment to the pending measure.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I was impressed with the testimony in favor of abolishing the practice to which I have referred, testimony of the senior Senator from Montana when speaking upon the bill now before the Senate. He brought it before the Senate in connection with the pending bill. He seemed to think it was very material, for he has mentioned the subject several times and testified to the viciousness of the practice. It occurred to me that this was a good place to remedy this vicious practice. So I consulted attorneys of the legislative drafting service, in whom I have a great deal of confidence, and they said it would be perfectly legitimate to offer the amendment to the pending bill. I sought counsel from the attorneys for the Federal Trade Commission. I explained to them the practice and the situation, and I had the benefit of their counsel.

I should prefer to have the matter go over until tomorrow in order to have all Senators read the proposal and to read the statements made by the Senator from Montana on this matter, and, if he reads his own statements, I am sure he will be ready to vote for my amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. I appreciate the fact that the Senator thinks he is putting me in a hole by offering the amendment, but the Senator is not doing that at all.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. No, no, Mr. President-

Mr. WHEELER. I appreciate why the amendment is offered. I do not believe it ought to be in this particular bill, because it is an amendment to the Federal Trade Commission Act. It is offered because I said that steel companies and oil companies which are monopolies are putting money in their pockets by the practice in question. That statement is correct, and I repeat it. I should like to see a comprehensive bill to prevent that sort of thing. I held hearings upon the subject and tried to have passed some legislation dealing with it, but was unable to do so. As the result of those investigations, however, the Federal Trade Commission acted, and has had hearings, and as I understand is recommending legislation to take care of the situation. I have also had the matter up with the Attorney General and as the result of the investigations that were made prosecutions have been instituted.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I will say, with all due respect to the Senator from Montana, that he put words in my mouth which I have not uttered, and motives in my mind which have not existed there. I may have been facetious when I said something about the Senator's testimony. I did that as one friend to another. I did not intend to put the Senator in a hole. I have never tried to put any Senator in a hole. I have never had any controversy with any man with whom I have disagreed. I have always given every man who disagreed with me credit for honesty and integrity. I never thought of putting the Senator in a hole, nor have I accused the Senator of trying to put me in the hole.

The Senator, who has been working very hard, is a little sensitive, a little irritated. I think that has something to do with his remarks. [Laughter.]

I do not think the Senator has any reason to feel irritated or have anything rankle in his bosom as the result of what has taken place during this debate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. Austin] asked a question of the Senator from Minnesota, and I do not believe the Senator from Minnesota has answered the ques-

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is correct. I was interrupted.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Minnesota did say that the Senator from Vermont misapprehended the whole thing. As I understood the question asked by the Senator from Vermont, it was very apropos and to the point.

I should like to have that question answered. In order to have that done I wish to propound a question to the Senator from Minnesota. I ask the question offhand. I never saw the amendment before today. I do not know anything about it. To construe it properly we ought to have before us the Federal Trade Commission Act, to see how the language would fit in with the act which it would amend.

While it is an amendment of the Federal Trade Commission Act, the amendment begins as follows:

For the purposes of this act.

As I understand, the amendment has no real applicability to the pending measure. Its application is to another act.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. What act is the Senator speaking of? Mr. NORRIS. The Federal Trade Commission Act.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The amendment is to the Federal Trade Commission Act.

Mr. NORRIS. But that was not the question. I wish to ask the Senator a question. The Senator from Minnesota said, in answer to the Senator from Vermont, that the amendment had no application to anything but a contract carrier. That is what I understood his language to mean. The Senator said it did not apply to an ordinary piece of freight that was shipped. It seems to me, from the language of the amendment itself, that it would apply. I may be wrong. I think it is a little ambiguous.

I wish to ask a question. Suppose a shipment is made on any stream, the rate on which has been passed upon by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Interstate Commerce Commission has approved that rate. Suppose it should then develop, after that rate has been charged, that some person or corporation has shipped a piece of freight in the price of which was included railroad freight, whereas the freight was not shipped on the railroad. Then is it not true that the shipper has violated one act, while at the same time he has the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission for what he did?

Mr. President, that situation worries me. Would it not be possible for a shipper to be guilty under one act, while he had the approval of the Commission under another act? That is the question I wanted to ask.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. This provision would prohibit the Interstate Commerce Commission from making any ruling in violation of the act.

Mr. NORRIS. I cannot understand it that way.

Mr. WHEELER. No. Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. The Commission might have no knowledge of the fact that there was a violation of the law. I do not mean to say that they would approve a rate which was in violation of the Clayton Antitrust Act or of the Federal Trade Commission Act. The Commission may approve a rate in due course, but a violation might occur a year or 5 years later, and the shipper might be guilty surreptitiously of a violation of the amendment which the Senator proposes.

I think there is a great danger in the amendment.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I think under the bill which is now before the Senate this kind of practices are not indulged in by those who are regulated. They could not be. They would have to charge the rate fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. And whatever rate the Interstate Commerce Commission should fix would apply to those who ship by common carriers, and that rate would be charged. It would not apply to a rate fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield. Mr. CONNALLY. As I understand the Senator's amendment, it has nothing on earth to do with the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission in fixing a rate.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Nothing at all.

Mr. CONNALLY. It is simply a rider to this bill amending the Federal Trade Commission Act, making it unlawful to charge as a part of the price of a product a rail rate when in fact the product is transported by water or by truck at a less rate.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It could not be better stated if we debated it for 3 weeks. That is all there is to it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I hope it will not be debated for 3 weeks. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I hope so, too; but I should like to have the amendment agreed to and sent to conference, which will give time to study it.

The Senator from Texas stated in a very few words all there is to the amendment. I should like to have a vote on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD].

Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. McNARY called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Logan]. I understand that if he were present he would vote as I shall vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. McNARY (when his name was called). Again referring to my pair, I withhold by vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass] is detained from the Senate because of illness.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is absent because of illness in his family.

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is absent on official business for the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. Schwellenbach] is unavoidably detained.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Bilbo], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Dona-HEY], the Senator from California [Mr. Downey], the Senator from Utah [Mr. King], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Logan], the Senator from New York [Mr. MEAD], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Thomas], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Van Nuys] are detained on important public

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. Tydings] is addressing the Iron Institute in New York City today, an engagement which he made more than 4 months ago, and is therefore necessarily absent.

Mr. AUSTIN. I desire to announce a general pair between the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Tydings].

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 54, as follows:

So Mr. Shipstead's amendment was rejected.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to amend section 3, paragraph (8), page 12, beginning at line 22, following the word "routes", so as to read:

Including such motor vehicle operations of carriers by rail or water or forwarding companies (except when confined to transfer or terminal operations), and including such motor vehicle operations of express companies (except when confined to transfer or terminal operations or operations incidental to through express service by rail or water). Persons acting as agents for common carriers in the performance of such excepted services shall not, as to such operations, be deemed common carriers by motor vehicles; but such operations shall be deemed to be those of the carrier for which they are performed.

And to amend section 3, paragraph (13), page 15, line 6, so as to read:

The term "express company" means any common carrier engaged in the express business by means of railroad and other modes of transportation.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I desire to say only a brief word in explanation of this amendment.

Under the existing law and under this bill, express companies of course are subject to regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The pending bill, however, proposes that there be one change in the character of the Interstate Commerce Commission's regulation of express companies. That is to say, on page 12, in prescribing the definition of the term "common carrier by motor vehicle", it puts in the category of a common carrier by motor vehicle the express operations which are carried on, not over rail lines, but by motor vehicles over land routes.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. PEPPER. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. The last portion of the suggested amendment is to amend section 3, paragraph (13), page 15, lines 6 and 7. That has already been done by another amendment which has already been adopted.

Mr. PEPPER. Then I will omit the second part of the amendment, and merely refer to the first part for the present.

The effect of the bill as now written would be to provide that the employees of an express company engaged in regular phases of the express business dealing with transportation by rail would be subjected to one set of rules and regulations, whereas the employees engaged in the transportation of commodities inside of a city or in the immediate environment of a city by motor vehicle would be subjected to an entirely different set of rules and regulations.

For example, under the existing law the employees of express companies are subject to the provisions of the Railway Labor Act; but if the bill as it is now amended were to be put into effect, the employees of that portion of the express company's business dealing with motor vehicles would not be subject to those provisions.

Under the existing law, the employees of an express company, whether operating motor vehicles around cities or in the vicinity thereof or engaged in the transportation of express commodities over railroads, are subject to the provisions of the Railroad Retirement Act; but the employees engaged in the motor-vehicle part of the business would not be subject to the Railroad Retirement Act if the existing proposals in the bill were put into effect.

Furthermore, all employees of express companies are now subject to the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act; but since there are no such provisions and there is no such act for employees of motor-vehicle carriers, if the bill as written were passed, the motor-vehicle employees of the express companies would not have the advantage of that act.

So the amendment merely provides, in substance, that the employees of express companies and the regulations of express companies shall be dealt with by the Interstate Commerce Commission under its authority to regulate express companies, and that they shall not be considered common carriers by motor vehicle just because the shipment came in at the railroad terminus, and motor vehicles carried the commodity over to the other side of the city, or to the community around about the city.

I see no objection, therefore, to the asserted reasonableness of the amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. PEPPER. Yes.

Mr. REED. Out of the discussion of this bill, as I get the principal importance of the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida, it lies in the parentheses included in page 12 of the bill, beginning at line 23.

In the bill, that parenthetical clause reads:

Such motor-vehicle operations-

Then come the parentheses-

(except when confined to transfer or terminal operations)-

The amendment offered by the Senator from Florida reads:

(except when confined to transfer or terminal operations-

Which is in the bill, and then adds-or operations incidental to through express service by rail or water).

So far as I am concerned—I do not undertake to speak for the committee—I have no objection to the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. Pepper]. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. PEPPER. I ask for a division.

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further amendments to be proposed? If not, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. McKELLAR. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Logan]. I understand that if present he would vote as I am about to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. McNARY (when his name was called). Again referring to my pair with the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. Schwellenbach], I am advised that if he were present he would vote as I am about to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who is absent on account of illness. I am informed that if present and at liberty to vote the Senator from Virginia would vote as I shall vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. LUCAS (when Mr. SLATTERY'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. SLATTERY] is unavoidably absent from the Senate today. If present, he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. RADCLIFFE. My colleague the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. Typings] is unfortunately detained on important business. Were he present, he would vote "yea" on this question.

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. Ashurst] is detained from the Senate on official business for the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Bilbo], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Logan], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Rus-SELL], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMATHERS], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Thomas], and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. Clark] are absent on important public business.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. Schwellenbach] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Van Nuys] are unavoidably detained.

I am advised that if present and voting these Senators would vote "yea."

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY], the Senator from California [Mr. Downey], the Senator from Utah [Mr. King], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] are detained on official business.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Smith] is absent because of illness in his family.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce the general pair of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

The result was announced—yeas 70, nays 6, as follows:

YEAS-70 Ellender Johnson, Colo. COMPULSORY BLOCK BOOKING AND BLIND SELLING OF MOTION-PICTURE FILMS

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, on the 20th of March I entered a motion to discharge the Committee on Interstate Commerce from further consideration of Senate bill 280, a bill to prohibit and prevent the trade practices known as compulsory block booking and blind selling in the leasing of motion-picture films in interstate and foreign commerce. That motion lies on the table. I now give notice that I shall at an appropriate hour tomorrow move the Senate to take the motion from the table and adopt it. I purpose to speak in support of the motion and relate to the Senate the extraordinary history of the bill to which it pertains.

The attention of the Senate is respectfully invited to the fact that the following-named organizations are now actively supporting the bill, which is the successor of other similar measures that have been before the Senate almost continuously for more than 11 years: American Association of University Women; American Home Economics Associaton; American Baptist Publication Society; Associated Film Audiences: Association for Childhood Education: Board of Temperance and Social Welfare of the Disciples of Christ; Catholic Boys' Brigade of the United States, Inc.; Catholic Central Verein of America: Catholic Daughters of America: Catholic Order of Foresters; Civic Club of Philadelphia; Committee on Moral and Social Welfare of the Lutheran Church in America; Council of Women for Home Missions; Editorial Council of the Religious Press; Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America; Girls' Friendly Society of United States of America; International Order of the King's Daughters and Sons, Inc.; Knights of Columbus; Massachusetts Civic League: Motion Picture Research Council: National Board of Young Women's Christian Associations; Nation Congress of Parents and Teachers; National Council of Catholic Women; National Council of Protestant Episcopal Churches; National Education Association; National Grange; National Motion Picture League, Inc.; National Sentinels; National Woman's Christian Temperance Union; National Women's Trade-Union League of America; Service Star Legion, Inc.

It has been estimated that these and other organizations which are supporting the bill have an aggregate membership of more than 50,000,000 American women and men.

And the Senate agree to the same.

ROBERT F. WAGNER. PRENTISS M. BROWN, JOHN A. DANAHER, JOHN H. BANKHEAD, Managers on the part of the Senate. HENRY B. STEAGALL, CLYDE WILLIAMS, BRENT SPENCE, JESSE P. WOLCOTT, Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I think it is fair to say that the conferees adopted substantially the Senate bill as we passed it. There was no material change.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan whether the provisions regarding prevailing wages, inserted in the Senate bill, have been retained in the bill?

Mr. BROWN. They are in the bill. The House conferees agreed to the provisions substantially as adopted by the Senate, with a very slight clerical amendment which did not change the sense in any manner whatever.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

FINANCIAL REHABILITATION OF RAILROADS

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 1869, the railroad reorganization bill, be made the unfinished business.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1869) to protect interstate commerce from the dangers of unsound financial structures and to establish improved procedures and standards for financial rehabilitation of railroads engaged in interstate commerce, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with amendments.

EXECUTIVE REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. CONNALLY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Reuben Gosnell, of South Carolina, to be United States marshal for the western district of South Carolina, which was ordered to be placed on the Executive Calendar.

ADMIRAL HARRY A. STUART

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, last week, the Committee on Naval Affairs reported favorably the nomination of Capt. Harry A. Stuart to be a rear admiral in the Navy. When the committee reported the nomination favorably, it was understood that a time might be fixed for hearing Senators who had some doubt about their position in approval of the nomination. In the routine of business, last Friday, the nomination was acted upon favorably. On Monday, because of the promise made to members of the committee that a time would be fixed for a hearing, I gave notice of a motion to reconsider. Having conferred with the members of the committee, I now ask unanimous consent that I may withdraw the notice I gave, so that the confirmation of the nomination may stand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the motion is withdrawn.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, one of the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the distinguished Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR], and some other Senators had some doubt, not about the qualifications of Captain Stuart but about the precedent, and I think I ought to say for the RECORD that the Senator from New Jersey and the other Senators have yielded to the opinion of the majority, having hesitated to approve the nomination only because they did not desire to go on record immediately as approving what they thought might be an unwise precedent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there are no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the nominations on the calendar.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, MAY 25, 1939

The House met at 12 o'clock noon with Mr. RAYBURN, Speaker pro tempore, presiding.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who dwellest beyond the seas, Thou art our Good Shepherd; we shall not want. In Thee are interwoven immeasurable strength and infinite tenderness, and as we hear the silvery chant we wonder, watch, and pray. Thou wilt not break the reed bruised by human ignorance nor wilt Thou quench the smoking flax of aspiration. Persuade us to walk in the spirit and freedom of the Master, always recognizing the claims of upright living and faithful duty. Blessed Lord, we pray that our Nation may be great, not alone in harvests and lands but in intelligence and obedience to law. Our Father, forbid that it may ever lose the sense of moral values. Be pleased to be with our people everywhere, and keep us in peace with all the world that a common wave of thought and understanding may lift mankind to a higher plane of Christian brotherhood. In our Redeemer's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 5427) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Labor Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. McKellar, Mr. Russell, Mr. McCarran, Mr. Bankhead, Mr. Lodge, and Mr. Bridges to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed without amendment to a concurrent resolution of the House of the following title:

H. Con. Res. 25. Concurrent resolution authorizing the printing of additional copies of the hearings held before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House on the bill entitled "Social Security Act Amendments of 1939."

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER (pro tempore). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Record and include therein an article from the General Welfare News Advocate

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I note the so-called Townsend bill was reported to the House yesterday by the Ways and Means Committee without recommendation and will likely be voted upon next Wednesday. I regret very much that it will be impossible for me to be present. I do not want anyone to believe that I would run away from this vote, and for that reason here declare myself and expect to leave a live pair against the bill. No one in my district will charge that I ever attempted to dodge this issue or any other. My last campaign was a straight Townsend fight. My Republican opponent really had no other important issue. so the question was determined at the polls, and I am here, although I will frankly admit by a reduced majority.

May I say here and now that at heart I do not believe there is a Townsendite who is more in favor of reasonable old-age pensions than I am and have been for thirty-odd years. My membership of more than 30 years in the Order of Eagles, the original sponsor of this worthy and humane issue, will so testify.

I am called "Pension Bill" in my district because of my activity and friendliness to liberal pensions for the war veterans and their dependents and the deserving needy. I think I can truly say that I have natural sympathy for the unfortunate. The present old-age pensions, in my opinion, are inadequate to the needs of our worthy aged.

I am in favor of pensions sufficient to permit all who are entitled to a pension to live decently, not only the aged but the blind, the helpless, and all unable to support themselves.

Had Dr. Townsend originally advocated a pension of $50 per month and not $200 per month, based upon a transaction tax, it is my belief that such a law would now be in effect. Folks generally, regardless of politics, believe in old-age pensions and caring for the needy. I think it is positively cruel to build hope in the hearts of millions of worthy people that they will ever receive such an unreasonable pension as $200 per month and thereby extract their nickels and dimes that the inner circle may eat thick beefsteaks and live at the best hotels in luxury.

I have from the first felt kindly toward the general-welfare bill proposed by Arthur Johnson, for whom I have great respect and who broke away from the Townsend outfit 2 years ago and proposed a reasonable pension on a gross income tax. I clearly and plainly announced my views in the 1938 campaign, and no one can or will charge me with demagogery or betrayal of confidence. I am ready and willing today or any day to vote for an old-age pension of $50 per month properly and safely financed.

Believing that I have here made my position plain, and without further discussion of this vital issue I wish to here insert in the RECORD an article appearing in the General Welfare News-Advocate of May 29, just out today. It was written, of course, before the third Townsend bill of this session had been introduced. It should be read and calmly and unselfishly considered-not thinking how it will affect my political future—before voting on this issue which so deeply affects millions of our people.

GREAT AMERICAN "JOKE" PROVES TRAGEDY TO AGED--TOWNSEND PLAN REVISION TAKES OLD FOLKS FROM FRYING PAN INTO FIRE

(By Arthur L. Johnson, legislative secretary)

After leading the old folks up a blind alley by assuring them for two and a half years that H. R. 4199 (H. R. 2) was perfect just the way I drafted it (even though we found 40 improvements necessary in addition to the 300 I put into it originally), Dr. Francis E. Townsend has now doubled back and led them up another blind alley by introducing, through Congressman Joe Hendercks, on May 17, 1939, a new measure, H. R. 6378, which seeks to modify H. R. 2 (the original Townsend bill which Hendercks also introduced) to overcome the objections raised to it, but in reality jumps from the frying pan into the fire.

MILLIONS-6 YEARS OF EFFORT-WASTED

After wasting over $4,000,000 wrung from the needy old people of America by $1 handshakes and million-dollar promises that have never been fulfilled, and after stirring hundreds of thousands of our elder citizens into a frenzy of endeavor, only to be sold down the river by some political deal, this modern Pied Piper of Hamelin now sounds his pipe for a trek backward into a field which will make the Townsend plan an even greater joke than it is now considered by the vast majority of the American public.

NEW PROVISIONS ANALYZED-COMPARED TO H. R. 5620

Even aside from what his devoted followers must think when they have to jump from H. R. 2 to H. R. 6378, after the doctor fraudulently assured them that the smaller the number of the bill the nearer enactment they were, and how they must feel about the nearer enactment they were, and how they must feel about his elimination of the enforced spending feature and adoption of the gross-income tax he has fought for 2 years, let us compare the new provisions in H. R. 6378 with the improvements made in the General Welfare Act by H. R. 11 and by H. R. 5620, which seeks to amend the Social Security Act to give all unemployed citizens over 60 an honorable Federal annuity of $30 to $60 per month financed by a 2-percent gross-income tax on "added value," with a deduction of the first $60 per month, or $720 per year, of gross income. Such comparison brings to light the following defects in the new Townsend bill which are not found in the fully improved General Welfare Act, H. R. 5620: Welfare Act, H. R. 5620:

1. The bill taxes the very purchasing power necessary to recovery. Workers are taxed directly 2 percent on their entire gross income and the rest of the taxes imposed are passed on to the general public and the great masses of the people pay them in the long run as indirect taxes. How it aids recovery or brings new purchasing power by taking $2 per month from John Smith, a laborer (which $2 he would spend for necessities that month), and giving this $2 to Tom Brown, a man over 60, is a question Dr. Townsend this $2 to Tom Brown, a man over 60, is a question Dr. Townsend has never been able to answer and constitutes the fundamental error upon which his whole "plan" has been erected. Purchasing power is not increased. It is merely passed around. The General Welfare Act exempts the very poor from taxation, something which neither the crackpot Townsend plan nor the fraudulent Social Security Act does. The G. W. A. would therefore be conducive to recovery and is a prosperity measure.

2. The tax under the new Townsend bill is essentially a sales tax which falls most heavily upon the poor and can never be enacted into law, as it will encounter the bitter opposition of organized labor, both the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. being on record against a sales tax as a tax on the poor. Strangely enough labor has not protested the S. S. A. tax on the gross income of the workers, but it will wake up when it comes to levying a direct Townsend tax on the workers of America, with no exemption for those earning just a few dollars per month. It is true that the next bill attempts to exempt those earning less than $50 per month by requiring no return if the tax in any month is less than $1, but the United States Supreme Court would, without question, there were true to the provision of the court would, without questions. throw out such a provision as discriminatory and unconstitutional, inasmuch as the bill does not give a like exemption of the first $50 per month of gross income to those receiving more than $50 per month.

3. The measure, instead of creating prosperity and more employment, would throw into the bread lines one and a half million persons now employed, by making it impossible for stockbrokers and real-estate men to continue business, as they would have to pay a 2-percent tax on the entire value of the stock or property sold each time it was transferred. While it might be a good thing to close the high-class gambling dens in New York, it would do the country no good as far as employment and prosperity are concerned and would do the aged no good if they could get no taxes from these sources

4. The tax under the measure would pyramid to the extent that a dollar would buy but 50 cents' worth of goods, monopolies would be built up because the large producers would drive the "little man" out of business, and those with a large turn-over of stock and a small profit would be driven out of business altogether.

5. The tax proposed would bring in less then $15 per month to

5. The tax proposed would bring in less than $15 per month to the 8,000,000 who would be eligible to share its proceeds, as the measure is so complicated it would cost a half a billion dollars a year to administer, would tax producers, manufacturers, whole-salers and jobbers but one-half of 1 percent instead of the 2 percent which it was estimated at the Ways and Means Committee hearing would bring in around $53 per month, provided stockbrokers, real-estate men, and little-business men could remain in the field, which Dr. Townsend doubted and who he felt should be allowed for society as they are "inofficient." eliminated for the good of society as they are "inefficient.

6. The new provisions in the measure are so worded that it would take 14 Philadelphia lawyers to figure out what they mean, 50,000 people to enforce them, and but 9 judges of the United States Supreme Court to throw them out as unconstitutional and meaningless.

7. One of the oddities brought to light by a casual study of the measure is that the cart is placed before the horse by collecting the tax for 4 months before the annuitants are registered. To withdraw 4 months' tax yields from circulation would cause a panic of no small proportions.

8. Another oddity is that there is no tax unless you are engaged in a business or occupation. Inheritances and gifts are exempted from gross income even though they constitute idle wealth and are the very things which should be taxed to promote recovery.

9. Means are set forth in the law to escape the 2-percent tax and come under the one-half of 1-percent tax by merely changing bookkeeping systems.

10. The tax on manufacturers could be interpreted as a 100-percent tax multiplied by a one-half of 1-percent tax, or a tax of 100½ percent.

11. A complicated system of taxing foreign exports is built up, when they should be exempted if we want our factories to run full blast employing the idle to manufacture for the foreign

12. National banks are exempted, but State banks are taxed, as are trustee transactions and loans. State banks would have to close their doors overnight, as would all mortgage companies and loan agencies.

13. Churches are exempt only if they can prove they are "societies."

14. Chambers of commerce are exempted, but labor organizations

15. Death benefits under life-insurance policies are exempt, even if the benefits run into the millions. The General Welfare Act exempts the first $2,000 only.

16. Amounts received from libel actions are exempt, as are alimony settlements. The General Welfare Act exempts the first $60 per month only.

17. If you attend a ball game, prize fight, or movie, you can claim a tax exemption if you save your ticket stub showing the amusement tax paid.

18. Reference is made in some sections to certain subsections not found in the bill.

19. Penalties are provided if the annuity is not spent "within the time required by this act," but no time is specified and the enforced spending section is eliminated.

20. It is made a misdemeanor for a father or mother to support an infant child or unmarried daughter.

21. An annuitant may send the entire amount of the annuity abroad each month.

22. Foreign-made goods may be purchased by the annuitants in preference to the goods made by the manufacturer who pays a tax to support the system.

to support the system.

23. A person could draw another Federal pension, in addition to the annuity under the bill.

24. Titles I, II, and VIII of the Social Security Act are repealed outright, which would mean that for 4 months and 19 days all State aid to the aged would stop and no checks could be issued by the Federal Government for old-age relief during this period.

25. Failure to integrate the measure into the Social Security Act structure will cause complications.

26. In States like Massachusetts the repeal of the three titles of the Social Security Act may make the State old-age-assistance law inoperative by withdrawing the Federal grant which the State matches.

matches.

All in all, the measure goes at the thing in the long, hard way. The improved General Welfare Act (H. R. 5620—amended H. R. 11) accomplishes the purposes the advocates of this foolish measure have in mind and does it in a very efficient, fair, and economical manner. Ours is a streamlined measure that is 2 years ahead of any in the field. They will all have to come to it eventually when the precule get wise to the feet that the wigs of straw held out to the people get wise to the fact that the wisps of straw held out to them by the money-grabbing exploiters of the poor and by the Social Security Act economists don't bring eats.

THE "SQUALUS" DISASTER

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, less than 48 hours ago the country was shocked at the terrible tragedy of the sinking of the Squalus. When the news came to us we received it with great sorrow in that the probability was that all these valuable lives had been lost. This morning we learned that 33 out of the 59 were rescued. The submarine bell used in rescuing these heroes was invented by the first candidate whom I appointed to Annapolis after I came to Congress in 1913. [Applause.] This young man, through his energy and ability, and because of the education he received at the Naval Academy and later under other naval auspices, gave his country and the world an invention that undoubtedly will continue to be used in future years to save the lives of the men who go down under the sea in ships. Certainly it is a credit to the Naval Academy and to the Navy Department and it is a credit to my district that Allen Rockwell McCann invented the very intricate "bell," so-called, by which the lives of these 33 heroes were saved yesterday.

I think Commander McCann is entitled to the applause you have so kindly extended to his name this afternoon, and I thank you in his behalf. I append hereto a brief summary of his naval career:

Born North Adams September 20, 1896. Appointed to Naval Academy January 23, 1913. Graduated and detached from Naval Academy March 24, 1917, and assigned to U.S.S. Kansas. Commissioned ensign March 30 and lieutenant, junior grade, July 30 of same year. September 23, 1919, detached from Kansas and assigned to U.S.S. Fulton for instruction in submarine work. December 11, 1919, ordered to duty on submarine K-6. May 18, 1920, placed in command of K-6. After serving on several submarines, was ordered to duty at New London submarine base April 29, 1924. In November 1925 was given additional duty as technical adviser to the Peruvian Naval Commission and rendered this service at Electric Boat Co., Groton, Conn. Continued on submarine duty until March 1929 when he was assigned to duty in the Bureau of Construction and Repair, Navy Department, Washington. Remained on duty here for 2 years, during which time he developed the submarine bell. In 1931 again went to sea as damage control officer on U.S.S. Indianapolis. Later assigned to staff of commander of cruiser scouting force as damage control officer. June 30, 1937, received his commission as commander. May 24, 1938. assigned to duty in Bureau of Navigation, Navy Department, Washington.

When word was received of accident Commander McCann went by plane to Portsmouth to assist in the use of the submarine bell or rescue chamber.

WASHINGTON MERRY-GO-ROUND

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD at this point, and to include an article from the Washington Merry-Go-Round of December 23, 1938, concerning myself, together with my reply to Messrs. Pearson and Allen, under date of January 4, 1939.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, rather than raise a question of personal privilege and take up the time of the House, I confine myself to making a statement of fact concerning a newspaper article which appeared in the Washington Times under date of December 23, 1938, and other newspapers throughout the country. The article was by Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen, authors of the Washington Merry-Go-Round, and it attributed to me the charge of being anti-Semitic, that I opposed the candidacy of a certain gentleman for United States district judge in the northern district of Ohio.

I have respected the proprieties of the situation by remaining silent until such time as a selection for this post was made. An individual has now been selected by the President of the United States, and his name has gone to the United States Senate for confirmation.

The article that I respectfully refer to I insert herewith at this point in the RECORD:

MERRY-GO-ROUND

(By Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen)

A hot behind-the-scenes fight is raging in Democratic congressional ranks over the effort of Father Coughlin to prevent the appointment of a Jewish judge in Cleveland. The proposed appointee is Emerich Burt Freed, United States district attorney in Cleveland, former law partner of Senator Bulkley, who is on the verge of being elevated to the United States District Court.

This has aroused the violent opposition of Representative Martin L. Sweeney, Democrat, of Cleveland, known as the chief congressional spokesman of Father Coughlin.

Basis of the Sweeney-Coughlin opposition is the fact that Freed is a Jew, and one not born in the United States. Born in Hungary in 1897, Freed was brought to the United States at the age of 13, was naturalized 10 years later.

Justice Department officials say he has made an excellent record as United States attorney, is able, progressive, and was second on the list of judicial candidates submitted by the executive committee of the Cleveland Bar Association. First on the list was Carl Friebolin, whom Justice Department officials say they would have gladly appointed despite his age of 60, had he not eliminated have gladly appointed despite his age of 60, had he not eliminated himself voluntarily for physical reasons.

Two others on the bar association's list, Walter Kinder and Harry Brainard, were eliminated because of big business or reactionary connections. Last on the list was Dan B. Cull, a former common-pleas court judge, and an excellent appointment except that he happens to be a Catholic and the last two judicial appointments in Ohio have been Catholics. So the Justice Department returned to the No. 2 man on the list, a Jew.

ITALE REPRESENTATIVE SWEENEY IS endeavoring to call a caucus of Irate, Representative Sweener is endeavoring to call a caucus of Ohio representatives December 28 to protest against Freed's appointment.

This article is a deliberate falsehood, and I cannot let this occasion pass without meeting the challenge of Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen, who have more than once published in their Washington Merry-Go-Round malicious falsehoods concerning Members of Congress in their official capacity.

During this session of Congress and in previous sessions, since I have been a Member for the past 8 years, it is not uncommon for Members on both sides of the aisle, and Members of the other body, to rise to a question of personal privilege to indict the abuse of a free press on the part of these well-known columnists.

After this article appeared December 23, 1938, I sought to reach Messrs. Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen by telephone to demand an explanation; then I dispatched a letter under date of January 4, 1939, a copy of which I insert herewith:

JANUARY 4, 1939.

Mr. DREW PEARSON,

MI. DREW PEARSON;
Washington Daily Merry-Go-Round, Washington, D. C.
MY DEAR MR. PEARSON: Under date of December 23, 1938, in the syndicated Washington Daily Merry-Go-Round written by Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen, there appeared a dirty, vicious article with reference to Father Coughlin and myself. This article charged us with raising the issue of anti-Semitism against the candidacy of Emerica Burt Freed United States district attorney in Cleveof Emerich Burt Freed, United States district attorney in Cleve-land, Ohio, who aspires to be a Federal district judge.

land. Ohio, who aspires to be a Federal district judge.

I did not read this article until it was sent to me by a citizen of Corpus Christi, Tex., who clipped the excerpt from the Corpus Christi Times, in which it appeared under date of December 23, 1938. This article reached me January 2, 1939, upon my arrival at the Nation's Capital. After reading the article I called your partner, Mr. Robert S. Allen, by telephone to demand an explanation. Mr. Allen stated he could not discuss the matter because it was written by you, and he respectfully referred me to you, giving your telephone number as Michigan 4321. In the last few days I have called your office several times. In each instance I left my telephone number for a return call, but for reasons best known to yourself you have failed to even extend to me the courtesy of yourself you have failed to even extend to me the courtesy of acknowledging my call.

Mr. Pearson, let me state your charge that "a hot behind-the-scenes fight is raging in Democratic congressional ranks over the effort of Father Coughlin to prevent the appointment of a Jewish judge in Cleveland" is a base falsehood. I am certain Father Coughlin does not know Mr. Freed, and I am equally certain that Father Coughlin in his long career never interfered in making recommendations for or against individuals seeking Federal appoint-

As for your charge that Representative Martin L. Sweeney is known as the chief congressional spokesman of Father Coughlin, again you utter a falsehood. As a newspaper man at the Capitol again you utter a falsehood. As a newspaper man at the Capitol you should know full well that while Father Coughlin has many friends in the Congress of the United States, there is no organized bloc, nor is anyone authorized to speak for Father Coughlin. Your false assumption was predicated, undoubtedly, because of the fact that on February 16, 1936, I arose unsolicited to defend the constitutional right of Father Coughlin to speak on political, social, and economic questions, as they affected the welfare of the Nation. That was the time, you will recall, when certain Members of Congress were challenging Father Coughlin's right as a clergyman to discuss governmental matters.

Mr. Pearson, you further state that the "Basis of the Sweeney-Coughlin opposition is the fact that Freed is a Jew, and one not born in the United States." Further you state that, "Irate Congressman Sweeney is endeavoring to call a caucus of Ohio Congressmen December 28 to protest against Freed's appointment." Again, you state a falsehood. I did call a caucus of the Democratic Congressmen from Ohio on December 28 for the purpose of discussing you state a faisehood. I did call a caucus of the Democratic Congressmen from Ohio on December 28 for the purpose of discussing Ohio problems. This meeting was held in the office of Senator Vic Donaher, and the subject of Mr. Freed's candidacy for judge was not even considered at this gathering. I respectfully refer you to Senator Vic Donaher, and the Congressmen present, as proof of this statement.

Mr. Pearson, it is a cowardly act to charge a person with being anti-Semitic without a semblance of proof. For your information

Mr. Pearson, it is a cowardy act to charge a person with being anti-Semitic without a semblance of proof. For your information, let me state I was born in the ghetto section of Cleveland, Ohio. My early playmates and neighbors were Jews. I learned to respect their customs, their traditions, and the practice of their religious rites. Many of my classmates in law school were Jews. For 8 years I was a judge in the city of Cleveland, Ohio. Hundreds of Jewish litigants and their lawyers appeared before me many times on controversial issues. Never once was the charge of intolerance on controversial issues. Never once was the charge of intolerance or injustice raised against me by any single individual or group. Coming from a persecuted race I have for years raised my voice against religious and racial bigotry. My reputation for tolerance in my native city of Cleveland, and for that matter throughout the country, is definitely assured. Of that I am certain.

I recite these facts, Mr. Pearson, not to dignify by argument the vicious article written by you, but solely to keep the record straight. In view of the foregoing I now challenge you to substantiate proof of your article of December 23 with reference to the charge of anti-Semitism as concerns the candidacy of Mr. Freed. I also challenge you to make public the source of your misinformation, and respectfully request that you apologize as equally prominent in the entire syndicate receiving your service as you presented your misstatements referred to herein. Failure as you presented your misstatements referred to herein. Failure to comply with this request will force me to reach the conclusion you have abused the traditional right of a free press, and have been guilty of stirring up racial and religious prejudice at a time when all decent newspapermen are condemning with all the vigor at their command such un-American and undemocratic conduct.

Sincerely yours,

This letter was sent registered mail, receipt requested, and the receipt for the same is in my possession. To date I have not received an answer from Drew Pearson, to whom the letter was directed.

Mr. Speaker, I have a wholesome respect for the members of the Fourth Estate, and I would be the last man in this Congress to make any attack upon the freedom of the press or in any way curtail its operations. I believe the freedom of the press is one of the cornerstones of our free institutions. It is unfortunate that the sins of a few members of this exalted profession bring discredit at times upon some very fine men and women who are engaged in the field of journalism.

The so-called factual information contained in the newspaper article making reference to certain candidates under consideration by the Department of Justice could only have come, in my opinion, to Messrs. Pearson and Allen through an employee of the Department of Justice. Many of my friends have reason to suspect that this information was given to the authors of this syndicated Merry-Go-Round by a gentleman whom I one time befriended, when he was down and out, by helping him to secure a position in the Department of Justice, where he rose to national prominence shortly after his appointment. That he is no longer connected with the Department of Justice does not excuse the suspicion that he collaborated with the authors of this

From time to time this column is used as a sounding board for the administration in developing questions of policy and in registering attacks upon Members of Congress who sometimes exhibit an independence and freedom of action not wholly concurred in by the powers that be in this administration. The close connection of Tommy Corcoran to the Washington Merry-Go-Round gives rise to the suspicion that he controls this column and that the information, factual or otherwise, that is published by his stooges, Pearson and Allen, emanate in the first instance from the socalled "brain trust."

Fully confident that in an instance of this kind I am justified in laying my case before the courts of the Nation, I have this day entered suit for libel against Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen, together with certain newspapers who publish the article in question.

My counsel is a former colleague, the Honorable John J. O'Connor, of New York, and I am willing that the issue be brought out in open court for an interpretation as to how far the freedom of the press can be abused and the character and reputation of individuals assassinated by newspaper writers of the type of the authors of the Washington Merry-Go-Round.

UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, early this week the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Rich] put into the Record an editorial. It seems to me it is high time that we consider other sides of that question.

I am sure that the majority of Members on both sides of the aisle are gravely alarmed by the revelations made before the Dies committee in the past few days. The facts already exposed, fragmentary and incomplete as they are, substantiate our worst fears. While many of us have long known from our own experience that anti-Semitism and anti-Semitic propaganda have been growing at an unprecedented rate in this country, we welcome any effort to bring these evils to the attention of the American people as a whole. We shall not, however, feel easy until we are certain that the probe into this un-American menace, whether it emanates from foreign or from native sources, has gone to the deepest root of the matter and taken firm measures to eradicate it.

To those of us who come from my great State of California it is not news that certain elements in the Republican Party have connections with the instigators of religious and racial prejudices. Anti-Semitism played its ugly part in the Republican election campaign in November 1938. My colleagues from other States, particularly from Minnesota and from New York, can testify to the fact that anti-Semitic propaganda was also utilized there in the 1938 elections, and that it was combined with red baiting and other forms of attack on the New Deal and the Democratic candidates.

At that time we should have welcomed an honest and thorough investigation into the nature, extent, and finances of this incitement to racial and religious prejudice, and into its un-American use by certain elements in the Republican Party. But at that time the Dies committee had other fish to fry.

Although officials high in Republican circles have been freely mentioned and even been subpensed to appear before this committee, I would not imply that my Republican colleagues, or the majority of Republican Party workers and voters share in or condone this kind of thing. On the contrary, I am sure that they share the horror of all decent citizens for the anti-Democratic filth spread by the witnesses now testifying before the Dies committee. But the Republican Party as a whole now stands before the bar of American public opinion. It will have to prove its loyalty to our form of government and its good faith by more than a mere verbal repudiation of the General Moseleys, Dudley Gilberts, and McWhirters whose whispering campaigns against the President and other high Government officials have been used for political purposes. Charges that progressive Americans are Communists or that they plot to replace our democratic Republic with some form of collectivism or dictatorship are unfortunately not confined to the gentlemen who have been subpensed by the Dies committee. Such wholly unwarranted charges have too often been heard from the Well of this House.

Now we see that patrioteering "warnings" against the New Deal and its progressive supporters in reality mask a conspiracy to overthrow the United States Government by force and violence. The letters introduced in evidence before the Dies committee do not mince words. They call for an American "Franco," to plunge our country into bloody civil warfare. They openly praise Hitler and Mussolini. They say that "things have already gone so far" that only military revolt and dictatorship can "save" America.

Responsible members of the Republican Party will now have to think twice before they echo the political sentiments of Father Coughlin, George Deatherage, General Moseley, and other openly subversive spokesmen for fascism. For if they do not, the American people will begin to ask how far their kinship with these enemies of democracy really grees.

We have already had ample warning of the danger that exists. The 1938 elections have given us warning. Each of us has been warned by what he has seen and heard in his own community. The increase in anti-Semitic and pro-Fascist propaganda that flows across our desks every day should have awakened us to what is going on. During the first days of this session each Member of the House received from that justly popular columnist, Walter Winchell, a little book entitled "Secret Armies." At the time I brought this book to the attention of the House, urging that we follow the advice of this great exponent of "true Americanism" and "wake up." But a number of my colleagues, including several from across the aisle, laughed off the warning and charged that Mr. Winchell and I had been duped by some more Communist propaganda. But since that time Mexico has found it necessary to arrest several Nazi spies, and among those arrested were several mentioned by name in Secret Armies. And since that time we have had revealed before a committee of this House a plot to form exactly the kind of secret army described in the book sent us by Walter Winchell.

We cannot dismiss the danger by calling it fantastic. Things too fantastic to imagine a few years ago have come to pass in other parts of the world. The danger from within is real and present, particularly because it is tied up with the real and present danger from without.

In the face of such real and present danger Republicans and Democrats alike have a heavy responsibility to the American people. Attacks on the President's foreign policy, coming from any source, will now be more than ever suspected. The menace of the aggressor nations is now clear as a pikestaff to every honest person, and it is clear that those nations follow in our own land the policies of penetration and dissemination of alien prejudices they have followed with such tragic success abroad. Repeal or drastic amendment of our neutrality legislation is made more than ever necessary by the revelations of the past few days. Only a firm stand, short of war, against aggression abroad can guarantee our successful defense of America from Fascist penetration at home.

Nor can attacks against the progressive domestic policies of the New Deal, attacks which parallel the propaganda of such subversive groups as the American Nationalists escape suspicion any longer. The attempt to couple the New Deal and all progressive legislation with leftist plots against democracy has been exposed in its true colors. It is nothing more nor less than a treasonable attempt to justify armed revolt against the Government of the United States, an attempt to invent a revolution in order to promote a counterrevolution.

Our Americanism is truly being tested these days. I hope that all of us in this House, seeing to what extremes of treason reaction is going in its opposition to the New Deal, will learn the lesson and pass the test.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and incorporate therein a speech made by our distinguished colleague the gentleman from New York, Mr. BRUCE BARTON, on May 23.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

GOVERNMENT ECONOMY

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a statement concerning our economy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, the paramount task confronting the American people today is to find work for the unemployed. Six years of unsuccessful experimentation have clearly demonstrated that this cannot be brought about by fabulous expenditures on the part of the Government, higher taxes, and a philosophy that engenders class hatred in the hearts of our people.

This morning Members of Congress received a communication from the Tax Action Union, which is pertinent and timely. Therefore, pursuant to the permission given me, I include that message, which is as follows:

To Members of Seventy-sixth Congress of the United States:

How close to the dam must we drift before you will take action?

Strong pleas have been made to you, the new Congress, to do two things to save the Nation:

1. Cut Government expenses; and 2. Increase the national income.

Neither has been done. On the contrary, the wasters of public funds have plunged the country deeper into the mire of public

Isn't it time to put millions of our idle back on pay rolls by giving tangible encouragement to business and investors?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the Members of the House to the Congressional Record of May 16, where the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cochran] placed in the RECORD an editorial by Arthur Krock. On the following day the same editorial was placed in the RECORD by Senator GUFFEY.

On May 23, three Members were granted permission to insert an article by Jay Franklin, published in the Evening Star on May 22. The fact that these articles were one and the same was not detected, and all three were published. One insertion was made in the proceedings which, although authorized by the House, was in direct violation of the Rules of the Joint Committee on Printing for publication of the RECORD, which require that all extraneous matter be printed in the Appendix.

I also call your attention to the RECORD of May 19, where these Members of the House asked and obtained permission to insert an editorial by David Lawrence. Upon discovery that the three requests were for the same editorial two were eliminated.

I may call your attention also to the fact that the Joint Committee on Printing has the authority under the law to keep duplications of articles out of the RECORD, even though the House may grant such permission, and I am going to ask the members of the Printing Committee if they will not devise some method that will prevent the duplication of such articles in the Record, because I believe that their publication once should be sufficient. I am the minority member of the committee and do not control it, but I hope we can stop duplication in the Record not only in the House but also by the Senate, if that is possible.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Rich] is always calling the attention of the Members of the House to the insertion of various matter in the RECORD. Now, I wish to call the attention of the membership of the House to the fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Rich] is a member of the Joint Committee on Printing, which has control of the RECORD. If his committee will adopt rules and regulations, to avoid duplication of these editorials, it will prevent just exactly what the gentleman is complaining about. His committee can stop the duplication of articles in the RECORD; and they can also stop newspaper articles and speeches from being published more than once. I am in favor of doing this, but the job is one that belongs to the Joint Committee on Printing, of which, I say, the gentleman from Pennsylvania is a member.

Mr. RICH. I may say to the gentleman that we have been trying to do that, but we have been unable to do so.

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. Plumley asked and was given permission to revise and extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a short editorial on peace by the El Centro Press.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

THE "SQUALUS" DISASTER

Mr. FLAHERTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLAHERTY. Mr. Speaker, I have filed a resolution for the purpose of investigating into the circumstances surrounding the foundering of the submarine Squalus.

We know that similar investigations in the past have done much to promote the adoption of safety devices that are now in operation in case of such accidents. I feel we should do something at this time to investigate the circumstances surrounding the foundering of the Squalus. Since a young man. Francis Murphy, in my district seemed to have a premonition that some disaster was to happen and wrote to his mother and asked her to pray for him in the course of this voyage. there may have been circumstances that caused the feeling that this young man experienced. I think we should investigate all circumstances relative to the construction and operation of this submarine, so that the mothers and wives of these boys may be confident that when these young men go down to the sea in ships they will return to them safely.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein some comments on international policies of democracies by Ivan G. McDaniel, of Los Angeles.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and to include therein articles by Hugh Johnson and other economists.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech delivered by Senator Robert A. Taft, of Ohio.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a short statement or article by General Hapgood, entitled, "The Way of the Dogs of War."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record and to include a short editorial from the New York Times of today, entitled "Out of the Depths," which is a very beautiful tribute to the young men who have lost their lives in the recent disaster.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

MODIFICATION OF PALESTINE CONVENTION

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I submit herewith a protest, signed by 15 members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, against the repudiation of the convention between the United States and Great Britain with reference to Palestine, dated May 3, 1924, with particular reference to article VII, which reads as follows:

Nothing contained in the present convention shall be affected by any modification which may be made in the terms of the mandate, as recited above, unless such modifications shall have been assented to by the United States-and ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

We, the undersigned members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, desire to call to the attention of the House and the State Department a declaration of the British Government announced last Wednesday, May 17, which is a clear repudiation of the convention between the United States and Great Britain with respect to Palestine, dated December 3, 1924. Article 7 of that treaty provides:

"Nothing contained in the present convention shall be affected by any modification which may be made in the terms of the mandate as recited above unless such modifications shall have been assented to by the United States."

The convention contains as a part thereof the Balfour declaration and the League of Nations mandate. Both the Balfour declaration and the mandate recite the solemn pledges of the British Government "to facilitate the establishment of a Jewish national home in Palestine."

In this connection we further call to your attention joint resolution of the Senate and the House, passed unanimously on June 30, 1922, known as the Lodge-Fish resolution, which recites, "That the United States of America favors the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people."

Lot Wednesder's desleration of the British Government is a

Last Wednesday's declaration of the British Government is a repudiation of the Balfour declaration, the mandate of the League of Nations, and of direct concern to us, a violation of article 7 of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, in that the contemplated action of the British Government proposes to restrict further immigration of Jews into Palestine and to reduce the Jewish people in Palestine to a permanent minority status. On neither of these matters has our Government been consulted, as required by the treaty.

We desire to point out to the Members of the House and to call to the attention of the State Department that Americans have invested over $100,000,000 in Palestine, relying upon the treaty between Great Britain and our Government and upon which treaty they had a right to rely. It is the duty of the American Government to protect these rights by proper protest and to see to it that the treaty is carried out in good faith.

As members of the Foreign Affairs Committee we respectfully request the State Department to advise the British Government that the contemplated action, if carried out, will be regarded as a violation of the British-American Convention and will be viewed violation of the British-American Convention and will be viewed with disfavor by the American people.

NATIONAL HOUSING AMENDMENTS, 1939

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 5324) to amend the National Housing Act, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement of the managers be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama calls up a conference report upon the National Housing Act amendments, 1939, and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

such premium charges shall be deposited in an account in the Treasury of the United States, which account shall be available for defraying the operating expenses of the Federal Housing Administration under this title, and any amounts in such account which are not needed for such purpose may be used for the payment of claims in connection with the insurance granted under this title.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5324) to amend the National Housing Act, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The House bill and the Senate amendment to the text of the bill both provide for extending to July 1, 1941, the authority of the Federal Housing Administrator to insure loans, advances of credit, and purchases of obligations representing loans and advances of credit, made by financial institutions for the purpose of financing alterations, repairs, and improvements upon urban, suburban, and with the second property. In the Second appropriate the property of the second property. rural real property. In the Senate amendment, however, it is provided that the President may fix an earlier date for the termination of such insurance upon his determination that there no longer exists any necessity for such insurance in order to make ample credit available.

Under the House bill, the Administrator is authorized to fix a Under the House bill, the Administrator is authorized to fix a premium charge for such insurance at not to exceed 1 percent per annum of the net proceeds of any such loan, advance of credit, or purchase of obligations, while the Senate amendment provides for a premium charge of one-half of 1 percent per annum of such net proceeds. The changes made by the House bill in existing law are to take effect on the 1st day of the second calendar month after the date of enactment of the act, while under the Senate amendment such changes are to take effect on July 1, 1939, which is the date when the authority of the Administrator under existing law expires. The House bill also provides in effect that a new period will commence with respect to the insurance granted by the Administrator on the date such changes become effective, and the Senate amendment provides in effect that such new period shall start on July 1, 1939.

The conference agreement extends the authority of the Administrator for 2 years as provided in the House bill, provides for a premium charge for insurance of not to exceed three-fourths of 1 percent per annum, and provides that the changes in existing law shall take effect on July 1, 1939, and starts the new period for the insurance on that date.

The House bill, in section 4A, corrects a typographical error in section 202 of the National Housing Act. There is no corresponding provision in the Senate amendment. The conference agreement provision in the Senate amendment. The conference agreement adopts the provision of the House bill.

The House bill and the Senate amendment both provide for in-

The House bill and the Senate amendment both provide for increasing from $3,000,000,000 to $4,000,000,000 the aggregate amount of principal obligations of mortgages which may be insured under title II of the National Housing Act and outstanding at any time, but such increase is to be made with the approval of the President. The House bill contains a further limitation that on and after July 1, 1941, no mortgages are to be insured under title II except mortgages that cover property which is approved for mortgage insurance prior to the completion of the construction of the property.

prior to the completion of the construction of the property.

The Senate amendment contains a provision that after July 1, 1941, no mortgages are to be insured that cover property the construction of which was completed more than 1 year prior to the date of the application for insurance except mortgages that cover property previously covered by an insured mortgage. This provision of the Senate amendment is coupled with a further limitation that the aggregate amount of principal obligations of all mortgages that cover property the construction of which was completed more than 1 year prior to the date of application for insurance, and that are insured after the effective date of the amendment made by the bill and outstanding at any one time, is not to exceed 25 percent of the total amount of the principal obligations of mortgages with respect to which insurance may be granted after such gages with respect to which insurance may be granted after such effective date.

The conference agreement adopts the limitation in the House bill with respect to insurance after July 1, 1941, but adds the exception contained in the Senate amendment with respect to mortgages covering property previously covered by an insured mortgage. It also retains the 25-percent limitation of the Senate amendment but eliminates the Senate provision with respect to insurance after July 1, 1941. July 1, 1941.

The House bill amends section 203 (b) (3) of the National Housing Act by striking out the limitation that until July 1, 1939, a mortgage of the so-called 90-percent class on small newly constructed and owner-occupied houses may have a maturity of not to exceed 25 years from the date of insurance of the mortgage instead of the 20-year amortization provision which is applicable to all other insured mortgages. The Senate amendment merely extends the time limit within which such 90-percent mortgages may carry a 25-year maturity for a period of 2 years, or until July 1, 1941. The conference agreement adopts the provision of the House bill.

The House bill contains a provision that in estimating the value The House bill contains a provision that in estimating the value of any property or project for the purpose of determining the amount of insurance under section 207 of the National Housing Act the Administrator shall determine such value as of the date of the application for insurance and in no case shall such estimate of value be in excess of the value of the property at that time plus the value of the proposed improvements thereon. The Senate amendment provides that a mortgage may not exceed the amount which the Administrator estimates will be the cost of the completed physical improvements on the property or project, exclusive of public utilities and streets, organization expenses, and miscellaneous charges during or incidental to construction. The conference agreement provides that a mortgage may not exceed the Administrators' estimate of such cost exclusive of the following: Public utilities and streets; taxes, interest, and insurance during construction; organization and legal expenses; and miscellaneous charges during or incidental to construction.

The Senate amendment also provides that in order to be eligible

The Senate amendment also provides that in order to be eligible for insurance under such section 207 a mortgage shall bear interest (exclusive of premium charges for insurance) at not to exceed 4½ percent per annum of the amount of the principal obligation outstanding at any time. Under existing law such interest rate is fixed at not to exceed 5 percent per annum. There is no corresponding provision in the House bill. The conference agreement adopts the provision of the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment contains a provision clarifying the provision of section 205 (b) of the National Housing Act with respect

The Senate amendment contains a provision clarifying the provision of section 205 (b) of the National Housing Act with respect to that part of the administrative expenses which may be charged to the general reinsurance account and the part which may be charged to the respective group accounts. There is no corresponding provision in the House bill. The conference agreement adopts the provision of the Senate amendment.

The House bill repeals section 210 of the National Housing Act, relating to insurance of mortgages on newly constructed multifamily dwellings or groups of not less than 10 single-family dwellings of a value in excess of $16,000 and not in excess of $200,000; but the Administrator is authorized to insure any mortgage with respect to which an application was filed prior to the effective date of the act. The Senate amendment contains a provision that the Administrator shall not insure a mortgage under section 207 or 210 of the National Housing Act, pursuant to any commitment to insure made subsequent to the date the provision becomes effective, which covers property on which there is or is to be located a dwelling or dwellings, the construction of which was commenced subsequent to such date, unless the principal contractor certifies that the laborers and mechanics employed in such construction have been paid not less than the wages prevailing in the locality for work of a similar nature, as determined by the Secretary of Labor. HENRY B. STEAGALL, CLYDE WILLIAMS, BRENT SPENCE, JESSE P. WOLCOTT, Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Luce].

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, it is not to be expected at this stage of the proceedings that change could be made in the conference report, even if it were desirable in any particular. It does, however, give opportunity to put up the sign that one may see at the country crossings of railroads, "Stop, look and listen." A brief summary of what has been done by us in this particular field may lead the House to consider more thoughtfully what in general is going on in our frame of government.

Legislation in this field began in 1932 with the Home Loan Bank Act, under a Republican administration, which I cite to show, if possible, that there is no partisan spirit in what I may have to say. The Home Loan Bank Act was enacted as a temporary measure to meet the conditions of a great crisis. Nothing permanent was expected of it. It was presumed then that the chain of emergency measures to follow would be temporary. The Home Loan Bank Act has accomplished its purpose and has been a useful measure.

Two years later, June 27, 1934, was signed the National Housing Act. The limits of its entanglement of the Government in financial responsibility was $1,000,000,000, and not to exceed $16,000 was to be lent on any one property. Again an emergency act, to meet not only the needs for more housing, in order to benefit the lower third of our people but also to furnish occupation to artisans who were out of work. This again was expected to be a temporary measure, and it is specified in the act that it was for the benefit of persons with low incomes. That, too, did its work.

The Housing Act of 1934 made provision for National Mortgage Associations. I very well remember this. I very well remember stating in the House, that for one in supporting this proposal I drowned my fears in my hopes. I hoped some good would come from it. For years, however, no national mortgage association was formed. Private capital would not go into that enterprise, and finally a national association was created by the Government, which has flourished after a fashion.

In 1935 came change in one significant particular. When the Home Loan Bank Act was enacted, it was designed to furnish financial help to persons occupying dwellings accommodating not more than three families. By change in 1935 that was made four families.

The original extension to three-family buildings was made at the instigation of my friend and colleague, Representative McCormack, of Massachusetts. It met a condition whereby the owner living in a three-apartment house might get the help of the Government. It was not then dreamed that we should extend the privilege beyond the limit lengthened in 1935 to four families.

Also in 1935 there were included in the range of Government financing multiple family, or what we call apartment houses, hotels, office, business, or other commercial buildings, hospitals, orphanages, colleges, schools, or manufacturing or industrial plants, up to a limit of $50,000. It will be seen that then we jumped away from the housing idea. The organization was still called the Housing Administration, just as the home-loan bank system had been called the "home loan" bank—homes, homes, homes, being the idea; but in 1935 Congress saw fit to go to the extent of all manner of buildings, and permitted mortgages up to $5,000,000, at 80 percent.

In 1937 came still another housing agency, the United States Housing Authority—not to be confused with the Federal Housing Administration. It is commonly known as the slum-clearance activity, ignoring what is its additional purpose, which is to subsidize dwelling facilities for the lower middle class. It cannot help those of our people who are so often referred to by high authority as "ill-housed." It makes absolutely no provision for placing the poor in sanitary, decent homes. As for slum clearance, it accomplishes its end, at the same time creating other slums. Now we are about to be asked to appropriate many millions more—$800,000,000, it is reported—to carry on its lopsided work.

These things, then, have been done in the course of 7 years. From a proposal for emergency legislation meeting the needs of the humble folk of the country, we have come to the point where already more than 10,000 of our people are employed in carrying on agencies meant for the most part to be temporary, but now firmly embedded in our economic system.

The question now rises whether we have engaged permanently in a field of activity that through all our history has been left to private enterprise.

I trust my friends from the South will understand that I have no other object in my next comment than to suggest considerations that might guide their action in the next 2 years. Those in control of their party have gone as far away from Thomas Jefferson as it is possible for the human intellect to travel. Thomas Jefferson believed that industry and activity of all sorts should be left to the individual. His doctrine is summed up in the statement, "The less legislation, the better." The housing matter is but typical of what is going on in other directions.

There are those who expect that all the mortgage business of the country will be taken over by the United States Government. There are those who expect all financing I have enumerated as within the powers of the Federal housing organizations will be taken over until the realtor will have lost most of his occupation. There are those who expect that by a continuation of this progress every man who wants to borrow money by use of mortgages for building or any other purpose will go to a Government agency. There are those in this House who time and again are urging that the Federal Reserve System be taken over by the Government. Others are urging that the Government should do all the lending; would destroy the banking system, now in private hands, and substitute for it Government banking.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. PATMAN. I know that a proposal in the form of a bill is pending for the Government to own the stock in the 12 Federal Reserve banks, but I do not know of any bill pending that proposes that the Government take over all the lending institutions. I wish the gentleman would refer to the bill that he has in mind for that purpose.

Mr. LUCE. Such a bill as I have suggested we would reach has not yet been presented. I am pointing out the ultimate end of this age of progress.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. LUCE. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Will the gentleman point out where the Government loans any money under the F. H. A.?

Mr. LUCE. Under a mechanism that may fairly be called "financing," we have conceived an insurance system that accomplishes the end in view. I am calling attention—not blaming or criticizing—but calling attention to the progress we have made in these last 7 years toward the Federal absorption of all financing in this country.

There is pending a bill that the newspapers report to have the serious consideration of the President, under which the lending of money to private business shall become a public function. The proposal is championed by an admirable Senator of long service in this House, who urges that we undertake to lend money to small business. Little of more danger could be propounded than that, but it is naturally the next step. If that bill reaches the floor of the Senate or House, in view of the many complaints coming to all Members from little-business men who are unable to make good, I fear it will pass the Senate and House. In that case you will have gone a long distance then toward the Government assuming the conduct of all finance, and therefore controlling all industry, large as well as small.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think it might also be well to point out that Dr. Adolph Whorley, who is recognized as one of the keenest minds in the administration at the present time, has only this week presented an argument embracing what the gentleman has just pointed out to the Temporary Economic Committee, and there is not any question in my mind whatsoever that the movement is definitely under way and is taking form in administration circles.

Furthermore, we are fully aware that the economists who are building the roadway, so to speak, are definitely now proposing that all creation of money credit be taken from the banks and that the issuance of money be brought entirely within the jurisdiction of the Government and not left in the hands of private banks as heretofore.

Mr. LUCE. I thank the gentleman for supplementing my remarks.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further to me?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. The gentleman still has not answered my question. The F. H. A. does not loan any money. The banks or other mortgage institutions loan the money, and all the F. H. A. does is to secure or insure that loan out of a fund which is raised by assessing a certain part of the premium on the mortgage; so that the Government does not lend a nickel. It is loaned by the banks or mortgage institutions.

Mr. LUCE. Artificially the gentleman is absolutely correct. It is a device for avoiding the facts in the matter, which are that the Government finances the institution. That is all I am charging.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I wish now to call attention to one instance of what happens when the Government finances private enterprise. In the list of things that the Housing Administration was authorized to do was the financing of apartment houses. An apartment house is, in my judgment, the most dangerous form of investment into which any man can put his capital. It invites to chicanery, it reeks with fraud. Already two cases of sad scandal have arisen, in St. Louis and in Louisville.

Attempt is made by this amendment pending to cut off the causes which permitted that scandal, but the thing remains, that it is folly to embark the Government in the financing of apartment houses, by reason of the changes in the nature of localities, by reason of new inventions making housing more comfortable, such for example as the air-conditioning system from which we now benefit.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. LUCE. I yield.

Mr. SPENCE. The gentleman mentions scandal in regard to Louisville. I may state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the Louisville project is now completely completed and is entirely ready for occupancy. There is a long waiting list, and it is in position to pay out every cent that it owes to local institutions from which they borrowed the money. I have a statement here if the gentleman will allow me to read it, a statement from the Administration as to the present status of the project.

Mr. LUCE. I will do so if the gentleman from Alabama will give me more time, but failing that I must ask the gentleman from Kentucky to do it in his own time.

Mr. SPENCE. I merely want to say that it is said the project is paying out. They have investigated the charges and found no truth in the charges.

Mr. LUCE. Then, Mr. Speaker, the newspapermen of Louisville must be addicted to misstatement. I am relying upon the fact that the Louisville papers have had headline stories on this for many days. What was done, as in St. Louis, was within the letter of the law as it stood, and I am glad to see that this conference report attempts to meet that particular evil. No conference report, however, can meet the fact that apartment houses shrink in value with exceptional speed; that the changes in the character of the locality are particularly influential; that these houses within a few years will be back numbers. Those of you who have lived in Washington in the last 20 years, as I have, know how Harry Wardman went up like a rocket and came down like the stick-know how many people in this city lost their savings by reason of apartment-house speculators. In the face of that, how can you justify Government insurance of mortgages on such dangerous property? In my own locality we had five trust companies go on the rocks by reason of this type of investment. Thousands of our people lost money

The housing system, as I have pointed out, began with the purpose of helping persons of low income in small amounts. It has grown to help persons of large income—the speculative class in the community with their huge investments.

It seems to be still the case that large oaks from little acorns grow.

Again I say, "Stop, lock, and listen!" [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma to submit a unanimous-consent request.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. Nichols asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the Record.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT AMENDMENTS, 1939

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cochran].

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, this conference report contains what might be termed a substitute compromise amendment for the amendment which I offered to the bill when it was under consideration in the House, the objective being to stop write-up of land values. It will be recalled my amendment was voted on six times—three times in the Committee of the Whole, three times in the House—and on the final vote, a roll call, was agreed to by a large majority. I might say that any number of Members came to me after the vote and said that if they fully understood the situation they would have voted for my amendment.

Since then a considerable number of the Members have discussed my amendment, saying that they have received protests from their constituents. When I asked them what business those who protested were engaged in, I found that the great majority were either promoters, building contractors, or architects. In other words, the protests came from those who had a selfish interest. This further convinced me that I was absolutely right and that my amendment would have corrected the evil to which it was directed—write-ups on land values—as well as padding other costs which, in the end, resulted in the 20 percent that the promoters were required to advance in order to secure the guaranty could be considered a liability rather than an asset because the 20 percent was loaded with water.

While my amendment was prompted by a situation that occurred in St. Louis County, which joins my own district, nevertheless, it has been learned that similar situations exist around the country. For instance, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Robsion] had an extension of remarks in the Record a few days ago in reference to a project in Louisville which was also referred to today by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Luce].

Of course I am disappointed that my amendment was not agreed to in conference, but I do want to say that the House conferees realized that by reason of the votes cast for my amendment, they were obligated to stand by my amendment. They conferred with me from time to time during the period that the bill was in conference and did not come to the final agreement until I said I would support the compromise.

Where there is a disagreement between the House and Senate conferees, naturally there must be a compromise. While I did not attend any meeting of the conferees, I do know that the Senate conferees absolutely refused to accept my amendment. It appeared that if an agreement could not be reached the bill would probably die in conference and the activities of the Federal Housing Administration would come to an end.

I think it should be distinctly understood that the purpose of the original law was to stimulate construction and put men to work and was not for the purpose of enriching promoters, building contractors, or architects. It developed that in order to initiate projects it was necessary to make concessions to the promoters, building contractors, and architects. I think this was a grave mistake, because if such a situation did exist or does exist now, then the Federal Housing Administration should come in and ask Congress for permission to handle the project itself, eliminating the builders and architects from the standpoint of promotion, and permit them to participate only after competitive bids have been received and the award made to the lowest responsible bidder. That is the policy that we follow in the construction of Federal buildings and if that can be handled successfully. no doubt the same procedure could be initiated in the Federal Housing Administration.

The amendment is one that cannot be easily analyzed. I found that out in discussing it with various Members of the House. I have had absolutely no experience in construction work or in financing projects of any kind, and therefore it was necessary for me to consult others.

The new feature of the law, the compromise amendment, limits the mortgage to 80 percent of the total valuation. The mortgage is limited under the amendment—80 percent or less, as the cost may be—to the actual cost of improvements on the property or project apart from the land. This is considered a strong factor in limiting the amount of the loan and protecting the Government interest.

The mortgage is further limited by the provision that no part of the mortgage proceeds could be used to pay the cost of public utilities and streets; taxes, interest, and insurance during construction; organization and legal expenses; and miscellaneous charges during or incidental to construction. In other words, the sponsors must now provide this.

The miscellaneous charges mentioned in the amendment cover land; new streets and utilities; extra foundations; interest during construction; taxes during construction—real estate; insurance—fire, windstorm, liability, and so forth, during construction; F. H. A. mortgage insurance premium—first year; F. H. A. examination fee; financing expense; title and recording expense; legal expense; organization expense; other estimated expense; and working capital. Working capital means money to carry on the project until sufficient rentals are received to do so.

In limiting the mortgage to 80 percent or less, the sponsors will be required to provide the land free and clear from all liens.

I feel I have secured an honest interpretation of the amendment and am certain it will prevent or offset any excessive valuation that might be attributed to the finished project because it requires the sponsor to put in a substantial amount of his own in the enterprise and the sponsor now knows at the time he will lose every nickel of it if the project does not work out.

It was, indeed, pleasing to me to hear the views of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Luce] on the compromise amendment. He confirms what others have already advised me that it was a real improvement over existing law.

The present law does not make provisions to cover anything but the ratio of the loan to the appraised or estimated value of the complete project.

I would say it now appears the only way to chisel or cheat on the project would be to write up the construction cost. However, it must be borne in mind that even if the F. H. A. does increase the construction cost above the property figure there would be a check on that figure because before accepting the F. H. A. guaranty, the insurance or finance company that would advance the money would have its own engineers and appraisers approve the construction cost, and if the cost was too high, then would undoubtedly refuse to accept the guaranteed mortgage.

No one is going to be dumb enough to feel that promoters of projects of this character were satisfied in the past to construct a project of this kind and receive in return for their share only 20 percent of common stock representing their contribution when they knew that no return could be made on the common stock for at least 20 years. The truth of the matter is, in my opinion, the cost of construction provided a sufficient sum that there was a very liberal profit on the lump sum advanced by the insurance company or the finance company that accepted the guaranteed mortgage.

The Senate conferees insisted they would never accept my amendment or another proviso I had included in the compromise amendment which reads as follows:

Provided further, That in estimating the value of the completed property or project the Administrator shall not attribute more than 15 percent of such value to the land as improved by such public utilities, streets, or other facilities as make it adaptable to the property or project.

Their argument was, that if this proviso was added it would absolutely eliminate any projects in large cities, and especially Detroit and New York. Senators from both Michigan and New York were members of the conference committee.

Those I have discussed the compromise with agree it is far better than the existing law and if it would have been in effect at the time Manhassett Village in St. Louis County was approved, the write-up on the land would have been approximately $70,000 less. In other words, the land value of the sponsors' 20 percent would have been about $100,000 rather than $170,000 plus. When you take into consideration that the sponsors insist that they paid $39,000 for the land to which they added $5,000 which they had put on an option on another piece of land and lost together with about $50,000 for improvements, such as constructing two roads, sewers, water, and so forth, leading up to the building line, it would not have been bad.

I am confident this new language in the act will prevent land write-ups to any extent in the future and further that it puts the Federal Housing Administration as well as insurance companies and financial institutions that advance the cash on notice that they must make a most thorough investigation before agreeing to finance a project, something that does not prevail under existing law.

It has been repeatedly said that the Federal Housing Administration is not to be blamed for the conditions that have developed in connection with the promotion of these projects because Congress in the law practically instructed the Federal Housing Administration to permit promoters to do just exactly what they have been doing. In other words, we said to the Federal Housing Administration in the law, "You are permitted to do certain things," while under the Security and Exchange Act, which everyone will admit is one of the outstanding achievements of this administration, we say to the individual, partnership, or corporation, "If you do what Congress tells the Federal Housing Administration it can do. you will be guilty of a felony and will be sent to the penitentiary." My contention is we should not tell a Government agency that it can do something that we prohibit private citizens of the country from doing.

While I feel we have accomplished a great deal, still as I said a moment ago, not as much as I would have liked to have accomplished.

We are placing the Federal Housing Administration on notice by this amendment. Using the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Luce], they should stop, look, and listen before approving such projects in the future.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan. Mr. WOLCOTT. The gentleman has stated that some headway has been made. It will be recalled that I discussed the gentleman's amendment at the time it was offered on the floor of the House. I believe that in the amendment adopted by the conference committee as a compromise between the gentleman's amendment and the Senate amendment the gentleman has gained a great victory. I believe he has accomplished his original purpose, and, as much as I hate to do so, I yield to the gentleman's intellect and tenacity in respect to this particular amendment. I want to congratulate the gentleman on another great victory which he has won here in the House of Representatives.

Mr. COCHRAN. I thank the gentleman from Michigan. I know the House concurs in my view in reference to the gentleman's ability, and especially in reference to matters handled by the Banking and Currency Committee. I am pleased to have his opinion. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to compliment the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cochran] on his industry and on his effort to safeguard the administration of the National Housing Act. I am sure every Member of the House shares his purpose in that connection.

I desire to read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri and which was adopted by the House:

That in estimating the value of the property or project for the purpose of determining the amount of insurance eligible under this section, the Administrator shall determine the value of the property as of the date of the application for insurance, and in no case shall he estimate the value of the property or project for insurance under this section to be in excess of the value of the property at such time plus the value of the proposed improvements thereon.

The conferees agreed upon a provision in lieu of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, which reads as follows:

That such mortgage shall not in any event exceed the amount which the Administrator estimates will be the cost of the completed physical improvements on the property or project, exclusive of the following: "Public utilities and streets, taxes, interest, and insurance during construction, organization, and legal expense and miscellaneous charges during or incidental to construction."

The addition of the language:

Completed physical improvements on the property or project, exclusive of the following: "Public utilities and streets, taxes, interest, and insurance during construction, organization and legal expenses, and miscellaneous charges during or incidental to construction,"—

Makes no substantial change in the provision adopted by the Senate.

I read these two provisions in order to call attention to the fact that the report of the conferees is more stringent in its restriction than the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri and adopted by the House.

Under the amendment adopted by the conferees there can be no write-up, so to speak, of land values in centers where land upon which construction would be undertaken reaches high figures. The provision agreed to in conference provides that in no case shall a loan be insured which exceeds the value of the improvements placed upon the land, exclusive of outside improvements, such as sewers, streets, and other incidental improvements. There can be no such thing as the insurance of a loan where the real-estate value might amount to half of the loan or an enormous amount. Construction cost cannot be exceeded under the provision agreed to in conference, which, it seems to me, carries a further safeguard than afforded by the original House amendment.

In any event we are all of one purpose, and I think we have safeguarded the administration of the law about as well as can be done by specific language of the act.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri. Mr. COCHRAN. I want the Record to show that I do not agree with the gentleman's statement that the compromise amendment is better than the amendment which I offered, nor that the original Senate amendment is the compromise amendment.

I base my statement on the fact that the gentleman stated, as did other members of his committee, as well as the Senate conferees stated, that my amendment would destroy the law insofar as section 207 is concerned. I denied my amendment would destroy the law, but I did say and I say now it would have prevented any write-ups on land values. That is what I tried to correct.

If this compromise amendment is stronger than my amendment, then it will likewise destroy the law, or at least that part of the law, but I know the conferees would never have agreed to an amendment that would have destroyed

Mr. STEAGALL. I may say to the gentleman that I am quite sure that I have never said either amendment would destroy the law or that the absence of either amendment would greatly affect the administration of the law. However, since the question was raised, every man having responsibility in the matter of course desired to meet the views of the gentleman from Missouri and to accomplish the purpose he had in mind. I read the two provisions for the purpose of supporting the statement I made to the effect that the provision adopted seems more stringent than the amendment that was adopted by the House.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I am fully convinced not only that the Administrator of this act is a man of the highest integrity and patriotism but that in his administration of this act he has displayed the highest order of administrative ability. I believe the Government is fortunate in having him at the head of this organization and I think that his administration has been as nearly perfect in accomplishing the purpose of the law as is humanly possible or reasonably to be expected.

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield to the gentleman from New York. Mr. BARRY. It was my understanding of the original House amendment that the land was to be appraised without any consideration being given to the immediate improvements that were to be placed thereon. It is my belief that this idea is contrary to the principles expressed in all realestate textbooks and to all theories of appraisal. I wish to quote a brief extract from a textbook known as "Real Estate Appraisal and Valuation," which is one of the standard

The value of an improved property is the result of an actual improvement standing on a particular plot of ground and can be treated only as a combination and in its entirety. The land cannot be valued without recognizing the buildings actually thereon, nor can the buildings be valued without coincident consideration of the land upon which they stand.

textbooks:

Judging by the debate on the original amendment, it was my impression that the Administrator would have to forget about the improvements that were actually going to take place and just evaluate the raw land. Thus his land would be worth less than the land of everybody else in the immediate vicinity, which would automatically increase in value because of the immediate improvement to be placed on the land in question.

Mr. STEAGALL. There is a peculiar element of risk involved in the insurance of loans covering projects such as provided in section 207 of this act. Recognizing the difficulties encountered in the administration of this feature of the law, the conferees feel, as does the gentleman from Missouri, that it is our duty to undertake to safeguard the rights of the public in the matter as far as is humanly possible. This is the purpose of the amendment, and we have no doubt it will accomplish that end.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan. Mr. HOOK. Is it not a fact that if the Cochran amendment were adopted it would cause a hesitancy on the part of capital to invest in this worthy venture?

Mr. STEAGALL. I believe the law is liberal enough as originally drawn and enacted and I believe it is liberal enough under the provisions of this conference report. It is true that the Government does not make any loan under this act, but the Government is responsible to an extent for the insurance provided on loans made possible by this act. I am sure every Member of the House desires, as does your committee, to protect the Government and the public in this matter as far as may be done by a specific provision of law.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CONSTRUCTION OF CERTAIN PUBLIC WORKS BY THE NAVY

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 2878) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with the construction of certain public works, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. MAPES. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I understand these Senate amendments have been considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman is correctly informed.

Mr. MAPES. And that the committee unanimously approves of the amendments and of the request by the gentleman that the House concur in the Senate amendments without a conference?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman is correct.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILLS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Kennedy] to call up omnibus claims bills.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 6261) for the relief of sundry claimants, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Title I-(H. R. 329. For the relief of R. L. Scott.) By Mr. BOYKIN That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to R. L. Scott, of Citronelle, Ala., the sum of $350 in full settlement of all claims against the United States of $350 in full settlement of all claims against the United States for damage to his automobile on the 4th day of February 1935, when it collided with a truck in the service of the Civilian Conservation Corps, between Chunchula and Gulfcrest, Ala., on United States Highway No. 45: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated In this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, has the reading of title I been completed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HANCOCK: Page 1, strike out title I.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the amendment comes too late. As I understand, the Clerk had already read title I.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk had just finished reading title I.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. And had started on title II and had announced title II.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not the recollection of the Chair.

The gentleman from New York is recognized for 5 minutes. Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, the men assigned to the work of considering bills on the Private Calendar did not know that this omnibus bill was coming up until a few moments ago. We must rely on the memory we have of the circumstances as we learned them several weeks or months ago in each individual case.

As I recall the facts in the bill before us, the claimant was driving a Ford car along a highway in Alabama about 200 yards behind a C. C. C. truck. The truck, for good and sufficient reasons, pulled off to the right of the highway and stopped. It was about 5:30 in the afternoon. The lights were turned on, both the headlights and taillights. The driver of the Ford which was following the C. C. C. truck was proceeding at 50 or 60 miles an hour, and the driver was unable to manage his car so as to clear the truck. He crashed into the rear of it and sustained certain damages. His excuse for the collision is that he was blinded by the headlights of a car coming from the opposite direction.

As I recall the facts, there is no negligence whatever on the part of the driver of the C. C. C. truck. If there is any negligence attributable to anybody, it is that of the driver of the Ford.

Under these circumstances there would be no liability on the part of a private defendant, and there is, of course, no liability on the part of the Federal Government in any event. Whatever award is made will be a gift.

I realize, of course, that gentlemen pay very little attention to these private bills as they come before us. Few Members bother to read them, and it is generally "love's labor lost" for us to stand up here and try to protect the Federal Treasury against these small raids. If the membership wishes to pass these bills, it is their responsibility and not ours. In my judgment, the present bill is plainly without merit.

The whole system of handling private bills is wrong. Some tribunal ought to be set up to pass on these bills after a careful examination of the evidence. As a matter of fact, this claim has been rejected by the Department of Agriculture. The Federal authorities have all reported against it. Everyone representing the Government who has examined the bill will certify that there is no liability on the part of the Government, either legal or equitable. All the gentlemen who have been assigned to examine private bills by the majority leader and the minority leader agree that there is no liability here whatever. There is not the slightest evidence of negligence on the part of any agent of the Federal Government.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK. I yield.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. The gentleman, by his remarks, casts a reflection upon the intelligence of the members of the Claims Committee. Does not the gentleman realize that we are supposed to examine carefully into the facts underlying these claims?

Mr. HANCOCK. I do not mean, of course, to attack the Claims Committee. I know a little about how that committee works, however. These bills are assigned to individual members of the Claims Committee to examine and report back to the full committee. They very frequentlyand this is a very human thing to do—say to the proponent of the bill, "Well, we will pass the bill out and you can take your chances when the bill gets to the floor." Very frequently the man introducing the bill is warned it will probably be objected to when it reaches the floor. Is not that the

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. I deny that that is the fact. and I deny there is any ground for impugning the good faith of the Claims Committee.

Mr. HANCOCK. I do not mean to attack the Claims Committee, of course.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. I do not mean in a personal

Mr. HANCOCK. But you are human beings just as we all are. I think you are subjected to considerably more pressure than those of us who are assigned to be the official so-and-sos, as we are sometimes called.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. I may say to the gentleman that some of the members of his own party who are members of that committee are as eagle-eyed as anyone would want to find in any court of law in the land, and any bill which gets by the vigilance of those gentlemen of his own party, not to mention the members of the Democratic Party on the committee, seem to me to have considerable merit. I just want to make this statement as a general observation.

Mr. HANCOCK. I think, perhaps, it would be better if the Claims Committee were made the court of last resort. If so, I think they would take their responsibilities much more seriously

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from New York.

There is no man in this House who has a keener mind or who is a more able or conscientious statesman than the gentleman who is offering this motion. There is no man whose judgment I regard more highly, but when he makes the statement to this House that the Claims Committee in this instance has not given this matter most careful consideration it shows the truth of his opening statement that he has not read the report. If anyone in this House will read the report in this case he will see that the contrary is absolutely the truth.

Another statement which the gentleman makes that I must contradict is that there is no evidence in this case of negligence on the part of the operator of the truck.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HANcock] has not practiced law in Alabama, as I have, for 30 years, and he is not an authority upon the law of Alabama; but if he had read the report he would have seen what the law of Alabama is in this case and that the Committee on Claims took it fully into account. The law of Alabama requires that any truck or other vehicle operating on a paved highway of that State desiring to stop and park must pull off of the paved center of the highway and onto the shoulder, which is made 8 feet wide. Not only is it required to do that. to give free and unimpeded passage to vehicles coming on behind it on the paved surface of the highway, but it is also required to give a signal, a timely signal, of its intention so to do. Neither of those things was done in this case. The evidence is undisputed that this truck was protruding onto the paved surface of the highway, which was only 18 feet wide, at least 3 feet. The C. C. C. boys say only 3 feet. The other witnesses say more. But, whether 3 feet or more, it was unquestionably parked in violation of the law. Therefore there can be no question but that there was primary and causal negligence on the part of the driver of this truck.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. HOBBS. I am glad to yield to the able gentleman from California.

Mr. COSTELLO. Is it not a fact that the car was following the C. C. C. truck at a distance of 200 yards, which should have given the driver of the car ample time to stop when he observed the truck in front of him?

Mr. HOBBS. I think that ordinarily that would be the case, but, as pointed out by the committee in its report, there was a fog at that time. It was at an hour after sundown described as dusk, and the visibility was poor.

Not only that, but there is no evidence as to that distance except by the driver of the truck. He says it was about 200 yards. That is categorically denied by the only disinterested witnesses who gave affidavits in this case, and also by the passing truck on the other side of the highway whose lights blinded this oncoming gentleman, the claimant.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. HOBBS. Certainly; I am happy to yield to the able gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. PITTENGER. And is it not true that in the report of the Secretary of Agriculture the negligence of the driver of this truck is admitted?

Mr. HANCOCK. Oh, I take issue with that.

Mr. PITTENGER. I ask the gentleman to read on the top of page 7 the report of the Department of Agriculture. I am simply trying to stand by the work of the Committee on Claims, which has gone over this.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman, I read from the report of the Secretary of Agriculture:

In view of the negligence established at that time on Mr. Scott's part and in the absence of any new evidence contradictory in character, the Department recommends that the bill be not passed.

Mr. HOBBS. But they also admit in that same report initial negligence on the part of the truck driver.

This case involves merely the cost of the repairs of this man's car, estimated at $400. He files his claim for $350. Evidently he did part of the repair work himself. It is a small matter. I have no interest in it except to try to see justice done. The claimant does not live in my district. I am simply pinch hitting for my friend, Frank Boykin, who is in Alabama at the bedside of his mother who is ill. In his stead, it gives me pleasure to espouse this righteous cause.

I submit that when the C. C. C. boys violate the law and park in direct violation of the statutes of the State of Alabama on the paved surface of a highway without a taillight and, admittedly, without giving any signal whatever, the favorable report of this claim by the Claims Committee is justified, and not only that, but that the criticism of the Claims Committee comes with ill grace. If ever there was a just claim submitted to Congress, this claim is one.

Mr. LEWIS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBBS. Gladly.

Mr. LEWIS of Ohio. Does the State of Alabama have the comparative negligence rule?

Mr. HOBBS. No. If, under the law of Alabama, Mr. Scott was himself guilty of negligence, which was the proximate cause of the injury, then under the law of Alabama he would be barred from recovery, but that word "proximate" is emphasized by our Supreme Court in every one of such cases. In this case, however, there is little, if any, credible evidence of any negligence whatsoever on the part of this claimant, much less that he was guilty of any negligence proximately causing his own injury.

This poor man asks for this pittance as a matter of right. Our experienced and careful Claims Committee has conscientiously weighed the evidence pro and con and reported that the claim should be paid. Honest American citizens may look to us, with assurance, for redress of their wrongs. Here and now, Mr. Scott appeals to us for justice, and his appeal must not be made in vain. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Hancock) there were—ayes 12, noes 51.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Title II—(H. R. 838. For the relief of the estate of Mrs. Ray E. Nies.)
By Mr. Mapes

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the estate of Mrs. Ray E. Nies, formerly of Holland, Ottawa County, Mich., the sum of $309.99 for damages to the automobile owned by her as a result of being struck and injured by a truck, in charge of and driven by a member of the United States Army, and which damage was sustained on the 8th day of August 1936 in the city of Holland, Mich.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 16, after the word "to", strike out the remainder of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Ray E. Nies, of Holland, Mich., the sum of $309.99, in full settlement of all claims against the United States for damages to the automobile owned by his wife, driven by his son, and sustained when it was struck by an Army truck on August 8, 1936, in Holland, Ottawa County, Mich., which damages were paid by the said Ray E. Nies: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Costello: Page 2, strike out all of title II.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, my motion is an attempt to strike out the second title of this bill.

The facts regarding this particular case are similar to the facts in the case just preceding, in that it involves a Government Army truck which collided with a civilian automobile. It appears that on the 8th of August 1936 a Government truck was proceeding in a convoy of Army trucks through the city of Holland, Mich., and the convoy was proceeding at about 20 to 25 miles per hour. Coming in the opposite direction was a car operated by Mr. Nies, and the two sideswiped. It appears that the civilian car was passing a car which was parked at the curb. The Army truck was passing another vehicle going in the same direction as the Army truck. The roadway at that particular place in the city was $31\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide, approximately room for five vehicles on the roadway.

As to responsibility, I leave that to you to decide. Apparently the Government truck was perfectly within its rights in passing a vehicle going in the same direction. It was preceded by a motorcycle escort which was escorting the convoy through the city. Regardless of whether the operator of the civilian car knew there was a police escort in front makes no difference. The fact is he had to pass several Government trucks going by him, and realized the fact that this convoy was passing through the city. It seems to me there was every responsibility upon the driver of the civilian car to use due caution, in view of the fact that there was this convoy or parade of trucks passing through the city.

However, by reason of the narrowness of the street, the fact that both vehicles were passing other vehicles, the two sideswiped. It is my belief that the driver of the Government truck was not responsible in causing the accident and that there was no negligence on his part. Therefore I do not believe there is any responsibility on the part of the Government to pay the claim asked here, $309.99.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COSTELLO. I vield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The gentleman said this was a convoy and it was preceded by a couple of motorcycle escorts. Has the gentleman noted in the spacing of the trucks in this convoy how far apart they were?

Mr. COSTELLO. I do not know how far this particular truck may have been traveling behind the one immediately in front of it, but usually there is some distance between the trucks in a convoy. The drivers are given instructions to maintain a definite distance between trucks. Sometimes the distance extends out and sometimes it narrows down. Frequently one truck falls behind and then it will have to speed up. In going through a city it is difficult to move a convoy through it at uniform speed because of the traffic interferences with which they are confronted. That is the reason why a police escort was given to the convoy, in order to facilitate its crossing through the city.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. May I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the Secretary of War in his report states that the trucks were spaced 50 to 100 yards apart, and that consequently that would mean that not more than one or two, at the most, trucks to the block. Consequently a car coming into the street might enter the street and not pass more than one or two of these trucks and never see the police escort at the head of the entire convoy. Further the report indicates that there were between these trucks several private passenger cars. I should also like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in his observation that this street was wide enough for five cars, there were three of the cars attempting to occupy one-half of the street and that two of those cars were facing in the normal direction, one parked at the curb, and one, the car that was injured, proceeding in a normal direction, with the third car, the odd car, trying to occupy a street that could accommodate five cars, and the Army truck proceeding in the wrong direction for the side of the street to which it was normally entitled.

Mr. COSTELLO. No. The testimony shows that the Army truck was in the center of the street. How far beyond the center line of the street it may have been is difficult to determine. It was occupying the middle of the street.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Speaker, Holland, Mich., is a city of approximately 14,000 inhabitants. It is located 4 or 5 miles from Lake Michigan and is surrounded by summer resorts. This accident took place on a Saturday night in August in the midst of the resort season, after dark, at a time when the streets were very crowded.

Let me say that this is the fourth time the Committee on Claims has reported this bill to the House. It has been objected to twice by the gentleman from California [Mr. Costello]. While our objector friends may criticize the Committee on Claims for reporting some of these bills, I think the Committee on Claims might well observe that the objectors seem to feel obliged to follow through with their opposition regardless, once they have made an objection. It becomes a habit with them after they once get started.

Now, here is a street in a resort community on a Saturday night filled with traffic. There was a maneuver of the Second Corps Area of the Army a few miles from the city, and hundreds of trucks were going through the city. The report of Major General Craig is that those trucks were going in a convoy from 50 to 100 yards apart. In between them were passenger cars. Now, what happened? There were cars parked on each side of the street. Here was a convoy of trucks.

In between the truck which caused the damage and another truck was a passenger car. The truck which caused the damage to the car in question was trying to pass, right in the city, this other passenger car. The truck got over on the left of the center of the street. The young man and his mother who were in the car that was struck were coming in the opposite direction and could not drive into the line of the parked cars on their side of the street. The truck went over to the left trying to pass a passenger car that was going in the same direction the truck was going and side-swiped the Nies' car.

The woman in this car which was being driven by her son was shocked. I do not know whether it had anything to do with her death, but she died on the 1st of the following January. No claim, however, is made for that. The only thing that is being asked for here is the actual damage to the car.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I may say that it happened that in the Seventy-fifth Congress this bill was referred to the subcommittee of which I was a member, which explains my interest in it. I have no personal interest in it, of course; but it is a fact as stated by the gentleman from Michigan that this bill asks only for damages. This surprises me, because under the evidence submitted I would have expected the bill to have included something for personal injuries as well. There are several affidavits in the hearings that convince me that the Army truck was clearly at fault. It was the Army truck that turned out. The passenger car was proceeding in the normal way on the proper side of the street.

Mr. MAPES. Absolutely; and there was no reason in the world why the Army truck in the few blocks it had to travel in this populous city on a Saturday night in August should have tried to pass this passenger car ahead of it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was rejected.

BEN L. KESSINGER AND M. CARLISLE MINOR

The Clerk read as follows:

Title III—(H. R. 1183. For the relief of Ben L. Kessinger and M. Carlisle Minor.) By Mr. Chapman

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Costello: Pages 3 and 4, strike out

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I offer this amendment in order to explain to the House the nature of this bill. In doing so I think it might be well also to explain something of the nature of the objectors' position here in the House. It is not a very enviable position.

The objectors on each side of the aisle are appointed by the floor leaders for the respective parties. It is our task to review both the Private and the Consent Calendars. When these calendars are called in the House if we believe that bills are not meritorious and should not pass by unanimous consent, it is incumbent upon us to object; it is not a question that we have the power to kill legislation or to stop it, but merely to prevent its passage by unanimous consent. Other methods are provided of bringing up bills that have not passed by unanimous consent, and this omnibus bill is the manner in which private bills may be brought before the House once they have been objected to when they first appear upon the Private Calendar.

The individual bill now under consideration is in itself very insignificant, but a question of policy is involved which personally I felt it was not incumbent upon me to pass upon. but one which the House itself should determine. It is a simple matter. Two attorneys were employed by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. During their period of employment they were given a salary. They were on salary for 1 month. During the same time they were also acting as fee attorneys for persons who had business with the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. The time came to pay them their monthly salary. The question was raised whether they could receive such salary in view of the fact that they were also entitled to collect fees from persons whom they represented before the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. The matter was referred to the Comptroller General, who declared that there was no right to pay that salary.

There is no question but what the attorneys did the work they were supposed to do with the Home Owners' Loan Corporation; neither is there any question but what they likewise handled business as fee attorneys. The question of impropriety in the work they were doing is not in any way involved, for there was no conflict between the work they were doing for the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and the people they represented. It is universally acknowledged, however, that an attorney should not be employed in a dual capacity, representing both sides of a case at the same time. The Comptroller General, feeling that the attorneys were so employed, ruled against the payment of this amount of money, and the General Accounting Office makes the statement that permitting employees to practice before the public agencies by which employed would seem so improper and out of line with sound policy as to suggest no need for a prohibiting statute to insure avoidance. Then they cite specific statutes prohibiting such practice. In the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Act there is no such prohibition.

As a result of this decision no other employees were employed by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation in a dual capacity. The two attorneys were not continued in a dual capacity after the one month of employment.

As a result, no particular harm will come if this bill should be passed. The attorneys will be paid for the 1 month's work which they performed, and I am quite sure no precedent would be established; but I merely take this time to explain my reason for objecting to the bill.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COSTELLO. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. Did the attorneys representing the individuals also represent the Home Owners' Loan Corporation on the same questions that they were representing their individual clients on?

Mr. COSTELLO. No; they did not. They were employed as attorneys for the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. At the same time they were also acting as fee attorneys for various other persons. There was no conflict in the actual work they were doing. In other words, they were not representing these civilians in opposition to the position they were occupying as attorneys for the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. There was nothing improper in their conduct.

Mr. DOWELL. They did not represent the Home Owners' Loan Corporation on the same question they were representing the individuals?

Mr. COSTELLO. No; they did not represent both sides on the same identical matter.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COSTELLO. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts

Mr. McCORMACK. In other words, the Comptroller General had a technical question advanced to him and his decision was a technical one?

Mr. COSTELLO. I would not say it was exactly a technical decision. It was a proper decision in order to avoid any possible difficulties arising in the future if this practice should continue. It is a dangerous practice to allow to exist, and we have statutes prohibiting it in most departments. However, in this instance no harm was done.

Mr. McCORMACK. My question is not to be taken as a criticism of the Comptroller General. In this particular case I see its far-reaching application. However, it was a technical decision?

Mr. COSTELLO. It was technical to that extent.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California has made a very fair statement of the facts in this case, and I possibly should be willing to rest the case upon the statement of facts made by him. I am personally familiar with the situation that brought about the employment of these two men.

The district office of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation at that time was next door to my own office in Lexington, Ky. These two young men were employed as attorneys for the Home Owners' Loan Corporation in their respective counties, and designated by the Corporation as suitable attorneys and as the officially recognized attorneys to prepare abstracts for borrowers from the Corporation. At that time there were so many applications for loans received by the district office and so many abstracts had to be examined that the district attorney for the Home Owners' Loan Corporation found it was necessary to employ assistants in order to do this work and pass upon these titles. The result was that these two young men-Mr. Ben L. Kessinger, of Lexington, and Mr. M. Carlisle Minor, of Danville-who had made outstanding records as capable abstractors, as competent title attorneys, who had done their work expeditiously and capably, were employed. They were solicited by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to accept this work as assistants to the district attorney, with the understanding in their contract that they should continue to do work as fee attorneys in their respective counties. Incidentally, the district attorney for the Home Owners' Loan Corporation at that time is now United States district attorney for the eastern district of Kentucky, Mr. John T. Metcalf. This district attorney himself assigned the titles for examination to the different local fee attorneys, and he himself in turn examined the abstracts prepared by these two attorneys. So they did not pass upon their own work.

The Home Owners' Loan Corporation Act provides:

The Corporation shall have power to select, employ, and fix the compensation of such officers, employees, attorneys, or agents as shall be necessary for the performance of its duties under this act, without regard to the provisions of other laws applicable to the employment or compensation of officers, employees, attorneys, or agents of the United States. * * The Corporation * * * shall determine its necessary expenditures under this act and the manner in which they shall be incurred, allowed, and paid without regard to the provisions of any other law governing the expenditures of public funds. * *

This was necessary because this corporation, a big lending agency, needed to function like a great insurance company or other mortgage company engaged in a big business which has to be transacted in a practical, economical, efficient, and expeditious manner. The result was that it had to operate like an insurance company or any mortgage company would. It is a rare thing for an insurance company and a borrower from an insurance company to have different attorneys, because the mortgage company as a rule designates the attorney to prepare the abstract and submit it for approval before making a loan.

Mr. Speaker, there is no conflict in these two employments. There is nothing contrary to public policy or antagonistic to the interest of the Government itself. It is true that the corporation is not beyond all law or accountability with respect to its expenditures, but in determining the expenditures which are necessary, resort must be had to established procedure of mortgage corporations.

Mr. Justice Brandeis, in the case of U. S. ex rel. Skinner & Eddy Corp. v. McCarl (275 U. S., p. 1), said:

Indeed an important if not the chief reason for employing the incorporated agencies was to enable them to employ commercial methods and to conduct their operations with a freedom supposed to be inconsistent with accountability of the Treasury under its established procedure of audit and control over the financial transactions of the United States.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. CHAPMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Is it not a fact that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation wanted to pay this claim, but could not pay it on account of a technical ruling by the Comptroller General?

Mr. CHAPMAN. The Board of Directors of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation voted to pay this claim. These men were employed on the initiative of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, which induced them to accept the employment and agreed that they might continue to do their work as fee attorneys.

Mr. SPENCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHAPMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SPENCE. This was employment merely for the purpose of examining titles and making abstracts?

Mr. CHAPMAN. Yes.

Mr. SPENCE. It had nothing to do with the other business of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation?

Mr. CHAPMAN. That is true. The standing of these men at the bar of Kentucky as lawyers of integrity, high character, and professional ethics is equal to that of any man I know in that State.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Luther A. Johnson). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. Costello].

The amendment was rejected.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. Kitchens asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the Record.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS EILLS UNION IRON WORKS

The Clerk read as follows:

Title IV—(H. R. 1750. To carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of the Union Iron Works.) By Mr. Mc-CORMACK

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Union Iron Works the sum of $165,284.53 in full settlement of all claims against the United States for the difference between the actual cost of the construction of three torpedo-boat destroyers and the amount paid under the contract entered into for the bullding of said boats, as found by the Court of Claims and reported in Senate Document No. 78, Seventy-third Congress, first session.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 5, after the word "session", insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Costello: On page 4, beginning in line 20, strike out all of title IV.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, the present bill provides for the payment of $165,000 to the Union Iron Works. The contract out of which this controversy arose was entered into back in 1898. The matter arose over the building of some naval vessels, three torpedo-boat destroyers. It was taken to the Court of Claims and the Court of Claims found that the claimant was paid everything to which it was legally entitled under the contract. The Court of Claims went into the matter of costs and found that the claimant had expended in excess of $1,000,000 in building these ships and had received in payment for their construction a little over $800,000, leaving a net loss to the company of the $165,284.53 which it is sought to recover here.

This matter has been before the Congress frequently prior to this time. It came up in the last Congress and the bill was ojected to on the Private Calendar. It was reported out in an omnibus bill, discussed on the floor of the House, and on a roll-call vote was stricken from the omnibus bill. Despite that fact, the bill is back before the Congress again. This is one reason the objectors are constrained, as one gentleman has remarked here today, to get in the habit of objecting, because the same bills are reported out to the House even though the House has definitely expressed on roll-call votes its disapproval of the claims.

If you will look on page 36 of the committee report accompanying this omnibus bill you will find at the bottom of the page a paragraph quoting the decision of the Court of Claims. The court points out that this case was barred by the general statute of limitations, yet it states:

Were the court to base its judgment on the merits, the petition would still have to be dismissed.

In other words, even though the statutory limitation were to be waived in favor of this claimant and the merits of the case were to be considered, the court still would have to deny relief.

The court stated:

The plaintiff is not entitled to either legal or equitable relief. The claim is one for a gratuity.

That is the nature of the claim. The claim is one for a gratuity. If the Congress wishes to grant this gratuity, we will leave it up to this Congress. Previous Congresses have refused to take such action.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California read just a part of the court's decision when he said:

Were the court to base its judgments on the merits, the petition would still have to be dismissed.

The Court did not stop there and the gentleman failed to read the rest of the sentence, which is:

Since the facts show no breach of contract, and none is alleged.

Of course, there is no breach of contract, because what happened? This company did the work in accordance with its contract and at the request of the Navy Department did extra work with the promise of the Navy Department that it would be paid for the extra work, with the Navy Department recommending that this amount be paid and with similar cases occurring in connection with three other companies. The three other companies which did work under similar conditions have received the money for the extra expense they incurred in doing the experimental work for the United States Navy.

What happened was this: In 1898 four different companies got contracts to build certain naval vessels. Mark you, this company is not in my district, but in the district represented by my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. Wig-GLESWORTH]. However, the claim is just and the claim is moral, and that is why I am supporting it. These four companies had a contract with the Navy Department, and they complied with the terms of the contract. Then the Navy Department asked them to experiment before the vessels were completed. As a result of the companies' doing so they incurred extra expenses. The Navy Department requested that they do this work, and the companies joined with the Navy Department in trying to improve the vessels after the contract was awarded. They changed the specifications at the request of the Navy Department on the implied promise of the Navy Department that "We will do everything we can to have Congress pay you the extra money," although the companies knew the Navy Department could not guarantee the payment.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from California

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, on page 33 this appears:

Most of the changes were not and could not be foreseen but were found necessary as the work developed. All of them were paid for in accordance with the method provided for in the contracts.

In other words, the extra work, the changes that were made by the company, was paid for in accordance with the terms of the contract that was entered into.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is true as far as the actual contract is concerned, but work was done in addition to the contract.

This happened in 1898, yes; but what is the history of the matter. Prior to 1902 the Navy Department investigated the claim and reported favorably on it. The time from 1902 to 1910 was taken up in having an act passed referring the claim to the Court of Claims. This matter remained in the Court of Claims from 1910 to 1933. It was not the fault of this company that the claim remained in that court for twenty-odd years. Five different Government attorneys came and went, and each new attorney who came in representing the Government had to go into the whole case again and learn the facts. This was not the fault of this company. Therefore the first opportunity to press this claim in the Congress was in 1933, and this is the only way a moral obligation can be paid.

Let us be frank about this matter. Last year one of these bills went through, and in the hysteria that then developed—we are practical men—the other bill was defeated. The three other companies have been paid for doing the same work this company did. No matter what we did last year, in good conscience the Government owes this company the money. As far as I am concerned, the company means nothing to me. I have never received a letter from them. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Wigglesworth] has conferred with me and Senator Walsh has conferred with me. I have looked into the facts, and I am satisfied they are entitled to it.

As I said before, three other companies have been paid for doing the same thing under the same kind of contract. This was extra work done at the request of the Government, and business certainly should not be penalized after spending its own money, and the work was done at the request of the Navy, under an implied promise that the Congress would reimburse them. While Congress does not have to do it, I maintain the Government is morally bound to pay them this money, and I contend that this is a just amount that this company is entitled to receive.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Luther A. Johnson). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. Costello] to strike cut the title.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Costello) there were—ayes 23, noes 46.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 172, nays 160, not voting 98, as follows:

Title V—(H. R. 1857. For the relief of Nell Mullen). By Mr. BOLAND

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Nell Mullen the sum of $1,950, in full settlement of all claims she may have against the Government for injuries received by her in the United States Post Office Building, at Scranton, Pa.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 5, beginning in line 20, after the name "Mullen", insert "of Scranton, Pa."; and in line 21, strike out "$1,950" and insert "$950"; and in line 24, after the word "Pennsylvania", insert "on December 22, 1924, when she slipped and fell because of the wet condition of the floor of said building: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RAYBURN). The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HALLECK: On pages 5 and 6, strike out all of title V.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, the facts presented by this amendment to strike title V are comparatively simple and I believe can be explained in a few words to the Members of the House to the end that an intelligent decision may be made.

Back in 1924, on December 22, a Miss Nell Mullen, living in Scranton, Pa., went into the post office in Scranton to mail a parcel-post package. It had been snowing outside all day and the Christmas rush was on. As a result of the congested condition of the post office and the snowy condition outside, the floor of the post office became damp and This lady slipped on the floor after entering the post office, fell, and injured her knee. The evidence is that she went to the hospital, and she did undoubtedly sustain some injury by reason of the fall.

Now, by this bill the Government is asked to pay $950 upon alleged negligence. The theory advanced by the committee is not that the custodian could have kept the floor dry by mopping it, because that was impossible under the circumstances, but rather on the theory that the Government custodian of the building was required to sand the floor of the post office to make it less slippery. Now, I submit to the Members of the House that you cannot predicate negligence upon any such failure as that. There is no Member of this House who is a lawyer and schooled in the law who would hesitate to defend any case such as this predicated as it is upon such an allegation of negligence. Why, if that could be held to be actionable negligence, then every man running a little grocery store would be required to sand the floor every time it snowed outside and the snow was tracked in and the floor became wet as a result thereof. Why, we would be required to sand the floors at the entrance of the Capitol, if you please, every winter whenever any person having business here walked into this building to transact that business.

Negligence, as I understand, is a failure to do that which a reasonably prudent person would do under the same or similar circumstances.

I do not believe that any precedent or practice in this country would require that under such circumstances sand or sawdust be placed on the floor of that post office. My guess is that if you tried to fix the floors of the post offices in that manner we would soon get so many complaints that we would have to stop before we hardly started.

This item is not large. The item itself does not involve a lot of money, but my information is that claims of this sort are constantly being asked of the Claims Committee, and I am sure that if we open the door by allowing such a claim as this to get by and thereby put our stamp of approval upon an alleged liability against the Government in a case such as this, we will soon find that we will not have much time for anything other than the consideration of bills of this character. I make this argument in order that the membership may know the issue and pass on the question. This item was objected to. It is now placed in the omnibus bill, and I think the membership should strike it out of the bill by voting for my amendment in order that the precedent of allowing such claims be not made.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. Yes.

Mr. BOLAND. Do I infer from the gentleman's remarks that we would be establishing a precedent of negligence in cases of this kind? Is it the gentleman's idea to tell this House that this is a precedent? Is it not a fact that claims of this kind have been paid before?

Mr. HALLECK. I do not know whether any claim like this has ever before been paid, but my information on that is that numerous such claims have been referred to the committee and the committee has not been allowing them. Whether there may have been a prior precedent, I do not know, but as of this date I do not want a further precedent if there has already been one, and I do not want any further inspiration to people throughout the country to believe that the Government or an individual or a county government or a State government is liable under circumstances such as these.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. HALLECK. Yes.

Mr. HANCOCK. Is there any allegation that the floor was defective in any way, or that there was any obstruction there which contributed to this accident?

Mr. HALLECK. No; there is no such allegation. The whole claim is predicated upon the fact that the floor was damp, was wet, and I contend that any person of normal intelligence stepping on that kind of a floor would be charged with a higher degree of caution than they would be charged with coming onto a dry floor. It is exactly the same situation as would require the District of Columbia to sand the streets here every time it rained to the end that one's automobile would not skid.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, no words are needed from me to put this case squarely before the House. The gentleman from Indiana, the objector, has presented his case, and I almost feel like leaving it as it is and taking the vote on the case as presented by him. He stated facts which, to my lay mind, convince me of negligence in the "nth" degree. He stated that there was no negligence involved in this case. The facts are that this lady, Nell Mullen, in all sincerity went into the post office at Scranton, Pa., to mail some parcel post, and with the crowded condition and the slippery condition of the floor it seems foolish to try to tell this body that there was no negligence at all upon the part of the custodian. It is a little beyond my comprehension. The facts are snow had been falling very heavily for hours previously to the accident, that the floor was slippery, and that the lady fell on the floor and broke her knee cap and was taken to the hospital and had to have treatment for 1 whole year. She was earning $60 a month, and, because of the negligence of the custodian of the post office, she was incapacitated for 1 whole year, if you please, and lost a salary of $60 a month for that period. It cost her hundreds of dollars for doctors' fees, and she is still under the doctor's care and has been since 1924.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BOLAND. Yes.

Mr. WALTER. As I understand it, the floor in this Federal building is a marble floor.

Mr. BOLAND. Yes. Mr. WALTER. Were the usual precautions with respect to mats and carpets observed?

Mr. BOLAND. There were no mats or carpets; and when the gentleman from Indiana says that the custodian did not have to put sand or sawdust or something on the floor during that slippery period, I say to you again it is a little bit beyond my comprehension when he endeavors to tell an intelligent body like this that there was no negligence on the part of the custodian. I appeal to you men here from a humanitarian standpoint that this woman has suffered an injury and has continued to suffer since 1924. The injury is permanent. I cannot see any reason for making such a commotion over a sum like $950, particularly in view of the fact that in the last Congress the House passed this bill but because of the situation at the time it was tied up in the Senate and was not enacted into law. The House passed this bill, and I appeal to you again not to cause this woman any more trouble or hardship than she has had already.

Mr. WALTER. What was the extent of the woman's injury?

Mr. BOLAND. She broke her kneecap, and that is a permanent injury, regardless of what the gentleman from Indiana may think of the situation or his statement of it being a minor injury. I am not a lawyer, but I have seen negligence cases disposed of in the courts of Lackawanna County, Pa., where justice generally prevails. By the way, right in this gallery today we have a former district attorney of Lackawanna County, Pa., Mr. Harold Scragg, who would verify everything I would say in regard to negligence cases in our State. He is a lawyer of ability and has a very enviable record as a district attorney. I remember distinctly one negligence case where a sidewalk in front of one of the stores was only raised 21/2 inches, and because somebody tripped over that 21/2 inches damages to the extent of thousands of dollars were awarded. The Treasury Department does not deny the allegations nor does it offer the usual objection to its passage.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BOLAND. I yield.

Mr. HALLECK. Will the gentleman tell us whether or not any rule or regulation of the Post Office Department regarding the care of post-office lobbies in such cases was violated in this particular instance?

Mr. BOLAND. I am not involving any rules and regulations at all. I am not talking from the standpoint of negligence, and there was negligence on the part of the custodian in not having some substance on there that would prevent people from slipping and breaking their limbs and causing them to be crippled all their lives.

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLAND. I yield.

Mr. O'TOOLE. Is it not the law of Pennsylvania that where unusual conditions occur the custodial force must take unusual precautions?

Mr. BOLAND. There is no question about that.

Mr. HALLECK. Will the gentleman yield further? Mr. BOLAND. I refuse to yield any further in this case. I leave it entirely with the House to do the right thing by Miss Mullen, who has been crippled since 1924.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Boland) there were ayes 46 and noes 73.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-three Members are present, not a quorum.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HANCOCK: On page 9, strike out all

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, if I may have the attention of the House for about 2 minutes, I can make the facts clear in this simple claim.

It arises out of an auction sale conducted by the Navy Department at Mare Island in 1924. The claimant was the successful bidder on a quantity of miscellaneous articles, and in pursuance of the terms of the auction he deposited 20 percent of his bid, namely, about $2,900. Under the terms of the sale the balance was due within 10 days. Despite the fact that the man received notice repeatedly to accept delivery of the goods and pay the balance due, he failed to do About 2 months later, after the purchaser had been notified time after time, the Government disposed of the goods elsewhere and declared the deposit forfeited, in accordance with the terms of the sale.

Let me read exactly what the terms of sale were in this regard:

In case of failure to carry out the terms of the payment, the 20-percent deposit will be forfeited to the United States Government as liquidated damages, and the bidder shall lose all right and interest in the material.

I assume it will be contended that such a clause is a penalty and not a forfeiture.

In answer to that let me refer to the case of Hickey v. United States (65 C. Cls. 729). I read from the syllabus in that case:

Where a contract of sale provides that if the balance of the purchase money is not paid within the time specified, "the Government reserves the right to forfeit the deposit as liquidated damages, and the bidder shall lose all right or interest in the property," failure to comply with the condition gives the Government the right to rescind the contract and appropriate the deposit.

Those are the facts in this case. There is no legal claim here whatever. We are absolutely without any justification to refund this amount of money; and, as pointed out by the Comptroller General, it is a question of policy whether the Congress will now make an exception to the law in this particular case. If we do so, there would appear to be no sound reason why other parties similarly situated should not be similarly treated. I assume there are hundreds of bidders who have been obliged to forfeit down payments. If we are going to relieve this man of his obligation, there is no reason in the world why we should not pass a general law and say that in all cases whatsoever the amount of the deposit shall be refunded to the bidder if he fails to complete a purchase.

I assume this is a case like so many others where the man was simply making a speculation. He made the initial deposit and figured on disposing of the goods at a profit before the final payment came due. He was disappointed in that and forfeited the original payment.

We feel sorry for this man; we are sorry for any man who sustains a loss; but, after all, we have an obligation to protect the interests and the rights of the people of the United States even though the amount involved is only $2,900.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt but what the House can pass this amendment and deny this man any portion of this claim, if it wants to. It happens that the man in question is a rather old individual who is crippled. He hobbles about on a pair of crutches. So far as I am able to determine he has no resources whatsoever.

The proposal before us is not that he get back the entire amount that was forfeited by him. The facts of the situation are that he was the successful bidder, but that the Navy did not actually deliver any goods to him at all. He claims that he did not understand the terms of this sale, that he thought he could take the goods a few at a time and by disposing of them he could pay for them over a period of time. Be that as it may, the fact remains that he never got any of the goods at all and that $2,876; namely, 20 percent of the sale price, was forfeited to the Government.

It is not proposed in this bill to restore the full amount to him, but only $1,438 and some odd cents, leaving to the Government $1,442, which certainly should be ample in the form of liquidated damages, even on the assumption that the Navy suffered a loss when it did finally resell the goods.

My contention is that as a matter of plain, elemental justice, since it would inflict a severe penalty upon this individual, that this amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, should be voted down and the bill should be passed as reported out by the committee. I appeal to the House as earnestly as I know how that it vote down the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York and pass the bill as it came from the committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. This was a deposit made at the time of bidding, as I understand, a deposit he was supposed to make; and the terms of the sale are as described by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Yes.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then why were not the goods delivered

Mr. VOORHIS of California. He could not take them. He found that some of the goods were not of the quality he had believed them to be, and he was not able to put up his money. He therefore could not or did not make the final payment. At any rate, none of the goods were delivered to him, and this money was forfeited for that reason.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Government has not lost any money, has it?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. No; and even if this bill is passed as reported by the committee, the Government will keep $1,442 of the amount forfeited.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is that over and above the $2,900?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. No; that is a portion of the $2,900.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield.

Mr. HANCOCK. I do not find anything in the report concerning the amount the Government ultimately received for these goods. They may have sustained a loss. They may have sold them for $2,000 or $5,000. The report is silent on that. The business of this man was to purchase goods at auction sales and to attempt to dispose of the goods. The probabilities are that he bid on these goods thinking he could make a quick turn-over and profit before he had to take them, but being disappointed in that he

I do not like to take issue with the gentleman from California, but I do not find anything in the report to the effect that these goods were not all they were represented to be. The man entered into a contract and defaulted, apparently, simply because he could not dispose of the goods before final payment became due in accordance with the terms of the contract; he forfeited his money, that is all. He was given ample time; instead of the 10 days he had a couple of months.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman let me reply to his question?

The committee in its report has this to say: That in the opinion of the committee 20 percent of the total price of the goods is exorbitant as liquidated damages, and obviously was a penalty. It seems to me that the committee is right.

The way the pending bill reads it is not a proposition of not inflicting any damages against this man, but damages are to be paid to the extent of $1,442. It seems to me the Government has been adequately compensated in this matter and that the passage of this bill and the defeat of the gentleman's amendment would be a matter of evident justice. I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York will be voted down.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Had the Government lost anything as a result of this transaction, does not the gentleman think such fact would have appeared in the report of the committee?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Yes, I do. I have no means of telling about that; but at any rate, as the bill now stands. the Government has $1,442 to cover that, even if the bill

[Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr.

FIRST OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL

MINNEAPOLIS STEEL & MACHINERY CO.

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Barden: Beginning on page 10, line 14, strike out all of title IX.

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I think it can be truthfully said that this is about the worst section I have ever seen come to the floor of the House in a bill for consideration.

The provision under consideration attempts to provide $1,200,000 to pay a group of steel workers who were employed in a steel plant engaged in the manufacture of munitions and war supplies. This was in 1918 during the World War and at a time when this Nation was engaged in war some 21 years ago. And there is no doubt in my mind but that every labor organization in America would frown on this type of

The provision attempts to provide excess pay for labor performed during that period of the war. They were not having any trouble with their employer. They were getting high wages.

Mr. RYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. RYAN. Does not the gentleman know the War Labor Board determined that they were having labor trouble and determined that a labor controversy existed, before this agreement was made? The gentleman has stated no labor controversy existed, but the War Labor Board found there was a labor controversy.

Mr. BARDEN. I am under the impression, after reading the report in this case, that the principal disturbance was between two unions on the outside and that the manufacturer himself was in between, so to speak. The War Labor Board. as I understand the matter, was only concerned with a portion of the contract involved.

The War Labor Board or someone in Washington permitted a representative or agent of the Government to go down and he made certain promises to the workmen that if they would keep on working and not shut down and go on strike, with 2,000,000 of our boys over yonder, leaving them with empty guns, they would adjust the differences and take care of the back pay. These people were furnishing the munitions for our Army and Navy and were threatening to go on strike, when they were getting higher wages than other people engaged in similar work, and approximately five times as much as those of us who were in the Army and Navy were getting.

Mr. RYAN. Is it not true that was done pursuant to an act of the President in setting up the War Labor Board so that it could cope with such emergencies, without interruption to the furnishing of munitions needed in France?

Mr. BARDEN. Yes; but there is a very serious question about that agent having any such authority to make the agreement involving the Government. Every Secretary of War since that time has ruled he did not have the authority and three Congresses have refused to pass this bill. In the Seventy-fourth Congress it was defeated by a yea-and-nay vote on the floor of the House. A record of this vote appears on pages 3892 and 3893 of the Congressional Record of March 17, 1936.

Mr. RYAN. Does the gentleman know how the Secretary of War who was Secretary at that time ruled in this case? Mr. BARDEN. He evidently passed it over in the war scramble. Certainly, if he had been very anxious to see it paid, he could have provided for its payment. But admitting that there is some color of claim, it is estimated that the least possible expense you could get by with in trying to find these employees now would be $125,000 just to find them. How are you going to find this group of steelworkers who worked in these plants 21 years ago? It is an impossible situation and this section would provide $1,200,000 of Government money when the Government does not owe one dollar of it.

Mr. RYAN. The bill provides that each of these people shall submit a claim and shall establish their claim, then the War Department may pass on the individual claim before any money will be paid.

Mr. BARDEN. It also provides 10 percent for the attorneys, or approximately $125,000 attorney fees. I hope the House will strike this section from the bill.

amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN].

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the

Mr. Speaker, at the outset I want to correct an impression under which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN] is laboring, to the effect that this bill was defeated on the floor of the House in the last Congress by a yea-andnay vote. I am informed by the chairman of the committee that is not the fact; that the bill was contained in an omnibus bill last year, but never reached the floor for a yea-and-nay

Mr. BARDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a comment on that situation?

Mr. RYAN. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina. Mr. BARDEN. I think possibly we can determine whether or not it was a yea-and-nay vote. However, it was defeated, was it not?

Mr. RYAN. The information which I have from the chairman of the committee is that the bill was not considered on the floor nor even voted on on the floor in the Seventy-fifth Congress.

Mr. BARDEN. It has been before the House for three Congresses, has it not?

Mr. RYAN. It did not reach a vote on its merits last year. That applies to the whole of the gentleman's argument that this is an old bill. It is difficult to get a claims bill on the floor for consideration, as the gentleman well knows if he has tried it. Throughout the years efforts have been made, since the Sixty-eighth Congress, to get this matter on the floor for consideration on its merits.

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RYAN. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina. Mr. BARDEN. I would like to say in connection with the yea-and-nay vote that I was accepting the notes furnished me as being correct. If the record does not support the notes furnished me, then I would not want to give the wrong impression.

Mr. RYAN. The bill was perhaps voted on in the Seventyfourth Congress, and that may be the gentleman's information. These are the facts:

The War Labor Board was set up by President Wilson for the purpose of adjusting labor difficulties which might arise in connection with contracts dealing with the furnishing of munitions to our Army. This was done in order that such adjustments could be made before the controversies came to the point of strikes and labor difficulties which would have crippled the operation of our Army in the field. Pursuant to the powers given to that Board an agent was sent to Minneapolis and to the adjoining territory because of these threatened labor difficulties in connection with the supplying of munitions to our Army. That man went to Minnesota. He met with the employees in many meetings and promised them that the War Labor Board would give them these increases. Then, later, after the war was over, and after the men had relied upon the representations this agent had made and had remained at work and had not brought their difficulties to the point where it would have crippled the operation of the plant, the Board of Contract Adjustment passed favorably on these claims and reported favorably on them to Secretary of War Newton D. Baker.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. RYAN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MAAS. Is it not true that a claim was paid by this Congress in the Bethlehem Steel case under identical facts? Mr. RYAN. I understand that in the case of the Bethlehem Steel Co. the employees were paid not by the Congress but by the War Labor Board, without action by Congress.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. RYAN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. PITTENGER. I call the attention of the gentleman to page 64 of the report, where it is stated that Secretary of War Newton D. Baker handed down a favorable decision.

Mr. RYAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. PITTENGER. I will ask if there is anything wrong with that statement of the committee report?

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. RYAN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan. Mr. HOOK. Does the gentleman mean to tell the Congress that these men were ready and willing to go on a strike and stop sending munitions overseas when our boys overseas needed them? I think enough profits were made in this war without giving away some more.

Mr. RYAN. I mean to say that the War Labor Board determined that a labor controversy existed, which it settled before there was any strike. The men patriotically went on with their work pursuant to that agreement in reliance on the representation of the duly authorized agent of the President. The Secretary of War, Newton D. Baker, the man who was in charge of our forces, found there had been a labor controversy and that the War Labor Board had maintained the status quo by reason of assurances explicitly and publicly given to these men that they could continue their work relying on these promises.

Mr. YOUNGDAHL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. RYAN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. YOUNGDAHL. The gentleman from North Carolina stated that the several succeeding Secretaries of War have disregarded the order made by the Honorable Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War during President Wilson's administration, and paid no attention to it. May I refer to the decision of the Supreme Court, shown on page 75 of the committee report, the crux of the decision being as follows:

It is no longer a case between the correctness of one officer's judgment and that of his successor.

This decision was rendered in the case of United States against Bank of Metropolis.

Therefore, I believe that when the Secretary of War, the Honorable Newton D. Baker, made his decision, that should have been final; and it was a contractual obligation between the Government and the claimants.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina to strike out all of title IX.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Ryan) there were—ayes 60, noes 30.

So the amendment was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL GRAIN CO., INC.

The Clerk read as follows:

Title X-(H. R. 2356. For the relief of the International Grain Co., Inc.) By Mr. RYAN

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to International Grain Co., a Minnesota corporation, of Minneapolis, Minn., the sum of $18,499.61, in full satisfaction of its claim against the United States for the difference between the contract price stated in the contract entered into by the War Department with the said International Grain Co., a Minnesota corporation, of Minneapolis, Minn., under date of September 15, 1918, for the storage of oats and the amount received by the said company from the War Department therefor; and for storage of several carloads of oats for which no payment has been made: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Costello: On page 13, beginning with line 1, strike out all of title \mathbf{X} .

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL

INTERNATIONAL GRAIN CO., INC.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, the present bill involves the payment of $18,499 to the International Grain Co. The facts of the case, briefly, are that in April 1918 a contract was entered into by the War Department with the International Grain Co. for the storage of wheat. In September of the same year a new contract was entered into providing for an increase in the rental of the storage space. Apparently no grain was stored in the warehouse until about August of that year. Subsequently an attempt was made by the War Department to enter into a third contract with this company and with various others. A few companies did sign the third contract; a majority of them rejected the third contract.

The time came for settlement of these various cases. Many of them the War Department did settle under the terms of the second agreement. However, in the present case, when the matter came up for settlement, it was referred to the Comptroller General's office, and because of the adverse report of the Comptroller General this particular claim has not been paid. The Comptroller General bases his objections upon the following statement:

The claim was disallowed on the ground that the claimant had received payment for the storage in accordance with the agreement effective April 1, 1918, which, though not a valid contract, was evidence of the intention of the parties, and for the further reason that, having certified the vouchers on which payments were made at the rate fixed in such agreement as being correct, its rights to payment for storage were exhausted.

In other words, when the International Grain Co. received vouchers in payment for storage of the grain made out in accordance with the terms of the agreement of April 1, 1918, the first contract, it accepted those vouchers in full settlement of the amount due. The company now comes to the Congress and endeavors to recover $18,000 additional which it would have received if payment had been made under the terms of the second contract, entered into in September of 1918.

By accepting the vouchers, in my opinion, they acknowledged their acceptance of full payment under the terms of the first contract and therefore should be estopped from setting up any right to demand the increase provided in the purported second contract.

The Comptroller General's office contends that neither contract was really entered into validly in that they were not approved by the War Department here in Washington, although approved in the District. In my opinion, the company has received the full amount to which it is legally entitled, and therefore this title should be stricken from the present bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amend-

Mr. Speaker, it will be observed that this bill proposes to pay the one remaining company which was not paid pursuant to the amount prescribed in the so-called second contract for the storage of this grain. Twenty-three other companies, all of them listed in the report on the bill, were paid according to the amount prescribed in the second contract.

The facts are these: The Government needed additional storage space throughout the country for oats and other grains required for the service and for the furnishing of forage for the Army. They entered into contracts with various elevator companies. This company, the International Grain Co., was not in the regular course of its business storing grain for any outsider, or any grain except such as was owned by the company itself, but for patriotic reasons they volunteered the storage that they gave under this first contract. For 90 days they received no grain. That contract provided that after the first 10 days they were to be paid at the rate of one-thirtieth of a cent per day per bushel. They notified the Government that they could not furnish the storage or hold it available any longer at that rate. As a result the Government furnished them with another contract providing for the payment of one-fifteenth of a cent per day instead of one-thirtieth of a cent for every day after the first 10 days. Consequently they went ahead and stored grain pursuant to that arrangement. Later, when the payments were made, they were paid according to the first contract at one-thirtieth of a cent instead of the contract under which they were then operating providing for one-fifteenth of a cent.

This bill proposes to pay them the additional one-thirtieth of a cent under which they stored the grain and which was signed and agreed to both by the War Department and the elevator company before this grain was stored.

The Quartermaster General's Department has reported favorably on the bill. Twenty-three other companies have been paid according to this contract, but this company alone has not received the amount agreed upon.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RYAN. I yield.

Mr. PITTENGER. As a matter of fact, this is simply a bill to have the Government pay an old debt for storage space for grain which everybody admits it owes, and which was held up on a technicality in the Comptroller General's Office.

Mr. RYAN. It proposes, as the gentleman says, to pay the amount agreed upon, under a contract the validity of which between private parties could not be questioned, but which has been held invalid on a technicality by the Comptroller General's Office, although the contract was executed and neither the War Department, the elevator company, nor anyone else denies that this was the contract under which they operated and under which they were expected to receive payment and under which all the other companies under similar circumstances actually were paid.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. Costello].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Costello) there were—ayes 41, noes 42.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Hook: Page 13, line 8, strike out "$18,499.61" and insert "$8.80."

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the amendment comes too late.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Parsons). The bill has not been finally passed upon, and the Chair thinks that we are still upon that particular paragraph, c. title X of the bill, and overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take 5 minutes. If gentlemen will look on page 83 of the report, they will find that the Comptroller General states:

Upon review the settlement is revised, and the sum of $8.80 is certified as due the claimant.

Now, if only $8.80 is certified by the Comptroller General as due to the claimants, why are we going to give them over $18,000?

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I read from the report of the brigadier general of the Quartermaster's Corps, of paragraph 7 of his findings:

This office is accordingly forwarding this case for review and examination, with the recommendation that such action as may be necessary be taken for the purpose of securing a disbursement in favor of the claimant herein in the total sum of $19.713.79, after certification from the Chief of Finance that disbursement in payment thereof has not previously been made.

The Comptroller General found there was $8.80 due, and that amount was paid, but the House has just acted upon the balance of the claim, all of which was found by the Comptroller General to be not payable because of the fact he claimed the contract was invalid. That has already been determined, and it is entirely out of line to claim now that the fact that the Comptroller General found $8.80 due is any argument whatsoever against the action the House has already taken on this claim.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment was rejected.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial from the Daily Argus Leader, of Sioux Falls, S. Dak.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read. The Clerk read as follows:

Title XI—(H. R. 3358. For the relief of the widow and minor children of James A. Henderson, deceased.) By Mr. TARVER

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 to the widow and minor children of James A. Henderson, deceased, in full settlement of all claims against the Government on account of injuries sustained by the said James A. Henderson on June 10, 1931, while riding in a truck on a Government road in Cherokee National Forest because of negligent construction and maintenance of said road, on account of which injuries the said James A. Henderson died: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 14, line 6, strike out "$5,000 to the widow and minor children" and insert "$3,500 to the estate"; and in line 8, after the word "deceased", insert "formerly of Fairmount, Ga."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Costello: Page 14, strike out all of title XI.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, the present bill proposes the payment of $3,500 to the estate of James A. Henderson. It appears that about 9 o'clock in the evening Mr. Henderson, along with two others, was driving along a road which was a Government road in the Cherokee National Forest. It is claimed that because of the negligent construction of the highway, the shoulder gave way, and the car ran off the road, turned over two or three times, and the said James A. Henderson was thereby killed. There is a statement that appears in the committee report that a truck driver, Mr. J. D. Collins, familiar with the road, testified by affidavit that he drove a truck hauling stone on said road prior to and after the date of said accident; that at the time of the accident the road on each end of the curve was wide enough for the Defiance 3-ton trucks to pass; that he drove such a truck, and that he often passed a similar truck at either end of the curve; that the curve itself was at least 14 feet wide and perhaps more.

The contention was made that the road was only 9 feet wide at this curve, and I raise this point, that regardless of whether the road was 9 feet wide or 90 feet wide, regardless of whether the shoulder of the road was well constructed, or poorly constructed, if this Congress is going to pass this bill, then you are going to make responsible for your highways every city, every county, every State in the Nation as well as the Federal Government, and if someone strikes a chuck hole in the road, you are going to immediately establish the fact that the Government should be responsible for all resultant injuries. I do not believe it is the intent of this Congress to assume responsibility for the accidents that may occur on every highway in the Nation, especially where it appears, as it does in this case, that the highway was not defective. I do not believe we should even be responsible if the highway were defective, and if that is true, certainly we should not be responsible if the highway is not defective. I think this title should be stricken from the present bill.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for recognition in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Speaker, there is every reason for agreeing with some of the logic which has been advanced by the gentlemen in charge of these objections. A while ago the gentleman from California [Mr. Costello] insisted that the House ought not be required to vote again on a bill which it had rejected last year. I insist, however, that that is a rule which ought to work both ways. This bill which is now under consideration was considered during a prior Congress. The gentlemen who serve as objectors made the same objections that they make now, and the House, after consideration, approved the bill, but owing to its being reached so late in the session it was not considered in the Senate.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I refuse to yield, because the statements of the gentleman were so misleading as to the facts that I must undertake to get the true facts before the House in the brief time that I have.

This accident, or occurrence, on account of which this man lost his life, leaving a widow and two minor children, for whose benefit this bill has been introduced, occurred because of the negligent construction of a road in a national forest. The evidence of eight witnesses appears in the record, showing that this road was constructed on a mountainside, that it was only 8 or 9 feet wide, that it sloped outwardly toward a very steep bluff, that there were no guardrails, and that on the side next to the bluff the composition of the road was sand or shale, so that when the automobile in which this man was riding, which was not being driven by him, came around this sharp curve onto this negligently constructed road the roadway itself gave way on the side next to the bluff and the automobile was precipitated down the mountainside, breaking this man's back.

The trouble with the gentleman from California is that he has adopted the evidence of one truck driver, J. D. Collins, as against the testimony of eight reputable witnesses who have testified to the contrary. It is true that the Department has reported against the payment of the amount carried in this bill. That report was based on an investigation made by officials of the Forest Service, whose dereliction in the construction of this road constitutes the negligence charged, and it is significant that they have not been able to find other witnesses than the two or three mentioned in the report of the committee to sustain their contentions. It is but natural, however, that they believed only that part of the evidence which tended to exculpate them.

The committee considered this matter carefully. It took into consideration the facts which I have mentioned and other facts which appear in the record which I do not have time to discuss. If you will read the report you will find that the committee determined that the weight of the evidence was in favor of the contention of the claimant as to the negligent construction of the road and as to the death of this man having occurred by reason of that negligent

This is a matter involving the welfare of a widow and her children. Only $3,500 is carried in the bill, although the usual homicide bill carries an appropriation of $5,000. The House has passed it once-passed it overwhelmingly. In fact, there were very few votes against it. It does seem to me that under those circumstances the gentlemen who serve in behalf of the leadership as objectors to legislation of this sort might have considered that they had satisfactorily performed their duty and that it was not necessary to bring this legislation before the House for a vote another time.

I wish to say that the eight witnesses who testified to the facts I have mentioned are reputable witnesses, and their evidence would be entitled to belief in any court in this land. I believe them. Any jury, in my judgment, in the country which might consider the case would believe them if the case were one which might be submitted to a jury.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. Costello].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Title XII—(H. R. 3674. For the relief of the Allegheny Forging Co.) By Mr. EBERHARTER

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Allegheny Forging Co., the sum of $1,700, in full settlement of all claims against the United States on account of forgings for kitchen trailers manufactured for the use of the United States Army Quartermaster: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. balance due it."

On page 15, line 10, after the word "Army", strike out the balance of line 10, down to and including the figures "$1,000", in line 22, and insert the following: "as a subcontractor of the Ohio Trailer Co., under a contract with the Government dated October 3, 1918: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Costello: On page 15, beginning in line 1, strike out all of title XII.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, the present bill proposes to pay to the Allegheny Forging Co. the sum of $1,700. The transactions out of which this claim arises are somewhat as follows:

The Allegheny Forging Co. was a subscontractor of the Ohio Trailer Co. The Ohio Trailer Co. had a contract with the Federal Government. After a time the Ohio Trailer Co. got into financial difficulties. They owed to the claimant some $8,420. Because of their financial difficulties they were not in a position to make that payment. The War Department Claims Board entered into negotiations with the Ohio Trailer Co. to settle claims which the War Department had with the Ohio Trailer Co. In that connection, the sum of $7,500 was agreed upon to be paid to the Ohio Trailer Co. for the account of the Allegheny Forging Co. However, the Ohio Trailer Co. paid only $4,100 of the amount to the Allegheny Forging Co. and they retained the balance, $3,400. The War Department discovered this and the Department made a demand on the company for a refund of the $3,400 which was not paid to the present claimant, the Allegheny Forging Co.

As a result of this discovery the Allegheny Co. then realized that they had been induced to enter into an agreement to accept a partial payment, when, as a matter of fact, there was on deposit with the Ohio Co. $7,500 which they might have received. Negotiations were entered into between the Allegheny Co. and the War Department whereby an agreement was made that the Allegheny Co. would accept $1,700, and the War Department would retain the other $1,700 remaining.

It is my opinion that having made this agreement to accept the $1,700 as a full settlement of the dispute, the Allegheny Co. is estopped from now coming in and trying to recover the remaining $1,700. They not only entered into an agreement whereby they received $1,700, but now they want to set that aside and get the entire amount. It seems to me that if they did not wish to acept $1,700 in full settlement, they should have rejected that offer at that time and demanded from the War Department the full $3,400. In view of their having accepted that agreement, I think this title should be stricken from the bill.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to

Mr. Speaker, most of the statements made by the gentleman from California are correct. I call the attention of the Members, however, to the fact that the claimant in this caseit is undisputed, not denied-manufactured for the use of the War Department $17,000 worth of forgings. The War Department having no further use for forgings to be used in connection with the contract of the Ohio Trailer Co., canceled this order after the company had manufactured $17,000 worth of forgings. Thereafter the War Claims Board awarded to be paid to this company the sum of $7,500. Of this amount they have received the sum of $5,800; in other words, on $17,000 worth of drop forgings manufactured for the War Department they were paid and received only $5,800.

It is true they accepted this $5,800, but in the first instance it was represented to the claimant by the other contractor that that was the entire sum that they would be able to obtain from the Government; and realizing that this other company was in financial difficulties-and it has since gone out of business-they naturally took what they could get at the time.

There is no denial of the fact that the War Claims Board awarded them $7,500, and that they have only received $5,800. For this Congress to approve the action of the other contractor in misrepresenting the facts to this claimant and cheat them out of $1,700 would be absolutely wrong. This claimant in simple justice is entitled to this additional $1,700. If this is paid them they will then have received $7,500 on $17,000 worth of drop forgings which they manufactured for the Government.

I think there is nothing for the Congress to do but to approve this bill; and I hope, considering the claim from all angles, the House will reject the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was rejected.

Title XIII—(H. R. 3675. For the relief of the Allegheny Forging Co.). By Mr. EBERHARTER

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Allegheny Forging Co., the sum of $1,775.42, in full settlement of all claims against the United States for steel ingots shipped to Balboa, Panama, for the Panama Canal: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold or receives now sum of the amount appropriated. collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. The committee amendments were agreed to. Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Costello: Page 16, beginning in line 9, strike out all of title XIII.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, this title proposes the payment of $1,775.42 to the Allegheny Forging Co. for a balance due upon a contract to furnish steel ingots to the Panama Canal Zone under a contract entered into in October of 1919. The Allegheny Forging Co. had bid on a Government contract to supply steel ingots. In making shipment to the Panama Canal, however, they failed to supply the forged ingot called for in the contract, namely, a billet; they did not live up to the specific requirements of their contract. As a result the shipment was rejected here in the United States. In spite of this rejection the ingots were sent on by the company to the Panama Canal. When they arrived in the Canal Zone the shipment was again rejected by the Government officials. As a result it was necessary for the Panama Canal government to purchase other material to take the place of this shipment which was not in accordance with the specifications of the contract. These ingots were on hand in the Panama Canal Zone. The Panama government then wrote to this company asking what should be done with the shipment. The company gave no instructions. As a result the steel ingots were sold in the Canal Zone for the benefit of the Allegheny Forging Co. and new steel was purchased in accordance with the contract.

Now, however, the Allegheny Forging Co. thinks it should receive $1,775, being the amount they claim to be due them under this contract to furnish these ingots. In view of the fact they failed to carry out the terms of their contract, they are not entitled to recover anything whatsoever, and for this reason I believe the title should be stricken from the bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. Costello].

Mr. Speaker, I might go into a little detail in connection with this matter. The claimant in this case in response to circularized invitations for proposals offered to furnish the Government steel on seven different items and they furnished this steel in accordance with the proposals. However, on five other items contained in the circularized invitation for proposals, the claimant in this case sent a letter to the general purchasing agent of the Panama Canal and asked him whether or not it would be possible to furnish them with forged ingots instead of the billets which were called for in the circularized invitations. In response to that letter of inquiry from the claimant in this case, the general purchasing officer of the Panama Canal wrote a letter to the claimant, and among other things stated:

In response to your inquiry as to whether or not this will be satisfactory I beg to advise, as previously stated in our letter of the 2d instant, these billets are for reforging purposes, and under these circumstances there will be no objection to the above.

On receipt of that letter the claimant shipped the forged ingots as called for by the general purchasing agent. Before shipping them the inspector of the Panama Canal, who was located in Pittsburgh at that time, made an inspection of these forged ingots. He analyzed them and found that they were not only correct as to analysis but that the quality was also first class. The Allegheny Forging Co., claimant in this case, made these ingots especially for the Panama Canal. Although the inspector at Pittsburgh said he had no authority to tell them to ship these ingots, nevertheless on authority of this letter from the general purchasing agent, the claimant in this case shipped the ingots.

A letter from the War Department clarifies the subject a good deal. It is stated in the letter of the War Depart-

The circular invitation for bids specified steel billets of certain cross-sectional dimensions but did not expressly state the length of the billets to be furnished. However, their length was fixed by reference to Navy specifications fixing the length of billets of the several cross-sectional dimensions called for by the invitation • • •.

It is customary to quote steel prices on a unit price per pound, and in order that proper extensions and total estimated price might be stated in the order accepting the bid, bidders were instructed to give the estimated weight of the steel proposed to be furnished. The bid of the Allegheny Forging Co. did not give the estimated weight of the respective billets offered, and it became necessary for the Panama Canal to compute and state this weight in the purchase order. Unfortunately, errors were made in the computation of weights, and the weights stated were very much less than they should have been and there were, of course, correspondingly lower extensions and total price stated in the order. This error is regrettable.

In other words, the Secretary of War admits that the error was on the part of the War Department and I again call attention to the letter of acceptance of the general purchasing agent.

Further, the letter of the Secretary of War in regard to this claim states that when they later bought forged ingots, to take the place of the rejected ones, they were required to pay a much higher price because of the fact that in their second circularization they asked for greater weights and for the correct sizes. The Comptroller General admitted that this claimant was entitled to $914.55, but the claimant refused to accept that amount, stating that he is entitled to not only the $914.55 which the Comptroller General says he is entitled to, but is also entitled to $1,775.42, the amount provided in this bill.

Mr. Speaker, in this connection I call attention to the fact that the claimant in this case made an allowance of $600.42 to the War Department, so that there is, in my opinion, a balance due in addition to what the Comptroller General allows of $1,775.42.

COAL

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, coal has contributed more toward making the United States of America the wealthiest of all the nations in the world than any other God-given treasure of the earth. For the solid fuels, anthracite and bituminous coal, form the keystone of the industrial development of our country.

For more than 125 years, coal has been mined in America, furnishing employment for labor, oportunity for the investment of capital, fuel for industrial fires, freight revenue for railroads, warmth for the home, and revenue for Federal,

State, and local governments.

Without coal, America never could have achieved the greatness we carelessly mark down as destiny. Without coal, America still would be a strictly agricultural country. Without coal, America never could have pushed her frontiers across the plains and mountains to the Pacific. Without coal, America never could have amassed the wealth that flows from industry. Without coal, America still would be one of the backward nations of the world. Americans owe an immeasurable debt to coal.

For more than a century, King Coal reigned supreme as the generator of power to turn the wheels of industry, which converted the raw materials of field and forest into finished products for the markets of the world. Coal furnished the power to drive our ships across the seven seas carrying cargoes to the ports of the world and returning laden with gold and silver and other raw materials to be processed into more wealth for our people. Coal gave America the Navy which made this country a world power for the first time.

No complete substitute for coal has ever been discovered, but in the last decades other fuels and other sources of power have been encroaching upon the domain of King Coal. Natural gas, oil, gasoline, electricity, and hydroelectric power gradually have been diminishing the markets for coal. These inroads came slowly at first, then rapidly. In recent years they have come with a ruinous rush.

These developments not only have disturbed the economic balance of the coal industry but seriously have affected many other industries, notably the railroad industry. This dislocation now amounts to a permanent depression in the coal industry. This depression in the coal industry is far reaching in its effect, touching the lives of millions of our citizens. It only serves to emphasize the importance of the coal industry of the welfare of the Nation.

For instance, in 1937, according to the United States Bureau of Mines, coal supplied 53.7 percent of the energy consumed in the United States. There are approximately 600,000 miners engaged in the extraction of these solid fuels from the earth. This indicates that more than 2,000,000 people are directly dependent upon the industry for livelihood. In my State of Pennsylvania there were, in 1936, 213,000 bituminous coal and anthracite miners. No late figures are available, but the number of our citizens dependent directly and indirectly upon bituminous coal and anthracite production, marketing, transportation, and bituminous coal processing must be in excess of 20,000,000.

It is obvious that the bare figures on the value of coal alone by no means present an adequate picture of the enormous value of coal to American industry. Without attempting to trace the value of coal beyond the industry itself, the value of coal at the mines makes its ultimate value somewhat apparent.

In 1935 the coal industry was by no means in a thriving condition. However, in that single year the value of bituminous coal at the mines was $658,063,000, while the value of anthracite was $210,130,565. From that beginning of $868,-000,000, coal supplied the energy to scores of industries, transmuted raw products and pyramided industrial values into billions and billions of dollars.

Despite the colossal value of coal to American industry as a whole, for some time the coal industries have been on the decline until today their plight has aroused grave concern. Thousands of miners are without employment and whole communities present social and economic problems that are crying for solutions.

For instance, in Clearfield County, in my congressional district, where coal is the chief industry, nearly 40 percent of the population is on relief. Unfortunately, Clearfield County seems to be cursed with about all the troubles known to the coal-mining industry and may not truly represent a cross section of conditions in coal-mining communities throughout the country, but it does serve as a striking illustration of the calamity that is creeping over the industry.

However, there is no gainsaying the figures furnished by the United Mine Workers of America on the steady decline in coal production and the heartbreaking slash in the annual earnings of the coal miners. In 1923 the production of bituminous coal was 552,000,000 tons. During the depression of 1932, production fell to the all-time modern low of 290,000,000 tons. In 1936, the best year of recovery, production was 411,000,000 tons and in 1937 only 407,000,000 tons. Final figures since that year are not available, but I am advised they are still lower.

Figures on the average annual earnings of the bituminouscoal miners, which also were furnished by the United Mine Workers of America, tell the most distressing story. In 1937 the average earnings of the bituminous-coal miners was $1,150, and in 1938 the average was only $559, and you gentlemen know what happens when a man's earnings are cut in half.

The anthracite industry, as well as the bituminous-coal industry in the older mining regions, provide an excellent example of the course of all mineral exploitation. Mining has been going on for over 125 years, and the reserves are adequate for hundreds of years to come at the present rate of production. However, the industry has reached a stage of maturity in the production cycle. The growing natural difficulties of mining, coupled with serious economic and social factors, have brought grave problems, the solution of which requires the best brains that we possess. There is required also a cooperative effort on the part of industry, government, and citizenry that has not heretofore been achieved.

Time will not permit a complete picture of the solid fuels industries, but two factors are so compelling that they must be discussed. One of these factors involves certain trends in consumer practice and habits which cannot be ignored. The first trend is to more efficient utilization of fuels as a result of the remarkable advance in technique made by technolo-gists during the past several decades.

In combustion such advances have been recorded for all types of consuming equipment. It has been most marked in central electric power stations where the pounds of coal required per kilowatt-hour have decreased from over 6 in 1902 to about 1.4 in 1935. Similar economies have been effected in the operation of steam locomotives, iron blast furnaces, and cement plants. In fact, most of the large industrial consumers of coal have increased the efficiency of utilization with a subsequent decrease in their tonnage requirements of coal.

Greater efficiencies, however, have been effected in using coal than in the use of fuel oil and natural gas. Since more labor is required in the mining and producing of coal than for the production of the other two fuels, the direct effect has been unemployment of many men. Of course, no one would contend that advances in technology which increase efficiency are undesirable. Increased efficiency of utilization makes for conservation, and at the same time enables us to have a full share of our natural resources. These resources are not replaceable, hence conservation and efficiency of utilization are of paramount importance. Nevertheless, the immediate result is a diminished demand for labor which has already resulted in many disturbing social and economic consequences in some communities such as Clearfield County in my district.

Another trend in utilization involves a change in consumer habits as exemplified by the substitution of fuel oil and natural gas for solid fuels by those consumers who are able and willing to pay more for these fuels. In 1937, according to the United States Bureau of Mines, fuel oil and gas oil equivalent to 110,000,000 tons of coal were used or developed; natural gas sold was equivalent to 61,000,000 tens of coal.

It is, of course, unsafe to predict how long the naturalgas supply will last. The widespread availability of this fuel as a result of the 180,000 to 200,000 miles of pipe lines has had a profound effect on consumer habits. Automatic heat must be made available to the public if the solid fuels industries are to retain their markets or regain lost ones. How to accomplish this can only be answered by research and investigation.

The second factor in the development of the coal industry which I wish to bring out is the small amount of research assistance rendered it in the past by governmental agencies.

Research has been called a national resource. In my opinion, research is a resource whose possibilities scarcely have been scratched, so far as coal is concerned. Let me quote from the report of the National Resources Committee, published in December 1938. It states:

In the present-day world research is one of man's necessities. While politically there are divisions, the world is largely one intellectually, and leadership in this intellectual world toward peace, prosperity, and happiness is increasingly a matter of research—research to find new materials, methods, and operations and research to better utilize the knowledge developed in the United States or in other countries for the good of the people of America.

If research is of significant importance to the welfare of the people, it must be of serious concern to the Government, and it becomes the Government's function and the citizen's duty to promote and advance research in all fields everywhere—in Government itself in industry and business, and in the universities and research itself, in industry and business, and in the universities and research foundations

That statement could be applied to no other field of research so aptly as coal. The paramount responsibility of government is to protect the general welfare. Since research is important to the public welfare, it is the duty of the Federal Government to support it; and since coal is one of our basic industries, which now is in great difficulty, it is the duty of the Federal Government to lend aid to research which may serve to rehabilitate it.

In January 1939 the energy resources committee submitted a report on energy resources and national policy to the National Resources Committee. This illuminating document stresses the importance of research to public welfare and shows that it is essential to conservation. I quote from this document:

Research can serve not only the immediate desire for economy but can serve also the future by devising methods by which inaccessible fuels are made accessible, methods whereby fuels are enabled to serve in uses in which they previously were not serviceable, and methods of conversion whereby products of the lower-grade fuels can serve with equal convenience in place of the fuels having greater form value.

Thus research can develop methods for making gaso-Thus research * * * can develop methods for making gaso-line and lubricants from coal, can decrease the cost of making gas from coal, can originate uses for byproducts whereby their value will be increased so that they can bear a larger part of the burden of the cost of coke making and thereby make a smokeless and con-venient fuel widely available, can make coke of coals that could not well be used in earlier coking processes, can develop methods of recovering most of the coal from thin and thick beds, and can in an unpredictable number of other ways bring about changes that will conserve the Nation's fuel resources and will retard the inevitable depletion of the fuels at present considered to be most

Both fundamental and applied or industrial research is needed in the conservation of the national fuel reserves. Fundamental in the conservation of the national fuel reserves. Fundamental research is required to apply the constantly increasing stream of new knowledge in the fields of chemistry, physics, and geology toward obtaining a better understanding of the occurrence, composition, properties, and changes which the mineral fuels undergo in their winning, preparation, and utilization. * * * Studies on the mechanism of combustion of solid fuels are fundamental to the continual lowering of the pounds of coal required for the generation of a kilowatt of electrical energy in power stations. * * * Industrial research is required to apply the results of fundamental research to the immediate problems of industry in winning, preparing, and utilizing fuels. Machinery and equipment must be developed to carry out on an industrial scale new reactions that developed to carry out on an industrial scale new reactions that have been discovered by the scientists. * * * Stokers and furnaces must be devised to fit the plastic and caking properties which fundamental investigations have disclosed with respect to the different kinds of coal.

In general, applied research on the preparation and utilization of fuels is conducted by industry under the stimulus of the profit motive; and, therefore, conservation in utilization has made much more progress than conservation in mining coal * * *. Research along these lines and in the substitution of lower grade fuels for the more limited resources of petroleum, natural gas, and the higher grade coals is less likely to be conducted by industrial interests. This type of applied research, as well as much of the required fundamental research, needs the support of governmental agencies.

There you have the last word on this fundamental problem of a basic industry—the last word from a group of publicspirited citizens with minds to fully comprehend the present problem and the vision to prepare for the future. If we heed their wise counsel now, we can avoid the mistakes of the past. Rich as our fuel resources are, they are not limitless. We cannot recklessly squander these God-given resources withcut regard to the welfare of future generations in America. The Dust Bowl of the Southwest is a grim reminder that no matter how bountiful nature may be, there is no forgiveness of sin against natural laws. Remote as the exhaustion of our fuel resources may seem right now, it is altogether possible that future generations may have cause to curse us for our selfishness and stupidity in squandering their birthright.

Wise and far-sighted statesmen long ago established the policy of the Federal Government cooperating with the States in supporting research programs in which there is a mutual interest. I need only refer to the several acts of Congress relating to the support of agricultural research. This is a sound policy in which the Federal Government helps the States that help themselves.

The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, as the oldest coalmining region in the country, is facing problems in its bituminous coal and anthracite industries that are particularly acute. As this Commonwealth has led the way in supplying the Nation with the solid fuels that have made our great industrial progress possible, so it is fitting that we should now assist her in the solution of those problems that are the direct result of her pioneering.

More miners are out of work in Pennsylvania than in any other State. Mining conditions are more difficult as is evidenced by high cost of mining. Enormous reserves are still available, but much good coal will be lost forever if the mining regions of Pennsylvania are now abandoned. In the interests of conservation the State must receive Federal support in its efforts to improve the bituminous coal and anthracite situation.

Not only is the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania painfully familiar with the problems, but she has already begun the attack on them that should lead to their ultimate solution. But the coal problem is by no means a State problem. It is a national problem and it deserves the attention and assistance given to the solution of all national problems.

The mineral industries experiment station of the Pennsylvania State College, one of the oldest land-grant colleges in the United States, was established in 1919. It is a going institution which already has contributed much to the welfare of the Commonwealth. It not only has the support of the State, but it has the confidence of industry as well. During the past decade the various mineral industries have contributed approximately $200,000 in support of research projects conducted in Pennsylvania's mineral industries experiment station. This is a mere drop in the bucket, to be sure, but under present conditions, these industries cannot do more. The Federal Government can, and, despite the present state of the Treasury, we can afford to make a sound investment for the future welfare of America.

There is a modern physical plant on the campus of the Pennsylvania State College. Excellent library and shop facilities are available as well as intelligent supervision of the highest order. The only department of fuel technology engaged in undergraduate instruction, extension instruction, and research in the United States is located there. It is staffed by men with graduate degrees from the finest institutions of higher learning in this country and abroad, followed by years of experience with fuels.

In addition, there are men in the school of mineral industries who are expert in other branches of the mineral industries, expert mineral engineers and technologists and other scientists who can be called upon to advise in connection with problems incidental to the proposed research program on anthracite and bituminous coal.

One of the first projects on coal hydrogenation in this country has been under way at this institution for 7 years. a very complete study of ash softening temperature and clinkering has been completed. Important work is under way on the preparation of coal solutions and the manufacture of useful products therefrom, on colloidal fuel, on coking, on treatment of coal and its products by bacteria, and other subjects.

Work conducted on anthracite has concerned itself with ignition temperature, burning properties, as well as new uses such as for a filter medium in water-treatment plants.

I have just introduced a bill providing for the further development and assistance of research work in the utilization of coal, both anthracite and bituminous. This measure would provide funds that will enable the School of Mineral Industries and Experiment Station of the Pennsylvania State College to increase and expand its program to the end that the bituminous coal and anthracite industries may be served in a manner that will contribute to the general welfare.

Many costly experiments have been tried in an effort to aid the coal industry. However, the one which offers the best opportunity for success, namely, research and investigation, has received only meager support. The solid fuels though complex in character are nevertheless valuable raw materials. Research is necessary to insure to our people the greatest possible benefits from these great natural resources.

I am not suggesting that our great natural resources are even approaching exhaustion, but up to now we have used them with a lavish and reckless hand. We no longer enjoy a pioneer economy and the time has come to take stock and at once conserve those resources while putting them to wider uses. That can be done only through research and investiga-

Mindful as I am of the distant future, I am far more concerned with the present and the immediate future of the coal industries. I am chiefly concerned with the compelling human problem of the present in coal-mining communities such as those in my district, which are to be found in all coalmining States.

Not so long ago, those coal-mining communities were thriving. Steady work at good wages was open to all willing to work. Smoke and coal dust laid grimy hands on the exteriors of homes, but within was cleanliness and contentment. Women sang at their tasks and the laughter of children rang out as they ran to meet their fathers returning from the mines. Saturday nights were gay and frolicsome.

Some of those same communities now are deserted villages, "ghost towns." Once happy homes, stark reminders of the past, stand with broken window panes, the buildings falling into decay. Not a sign of human life is present. Smoke rising from piles of "boney," the long-burning shale residue of coal, add to the picture of desolation. It appears as if a devastating army had passed that way and left ruin in its Saddening as such sights may seem, the once thriving coal communities, which now are in the death struggle with depression in the industry, are even more depressing. Some of the mines now are worked only 3 days, 2 days, and even 1 day a week, when they are not closed completely. There is where you find a moving American tragedy.

Hopeless men, care-ridden women, and underfed children inhabit these towns where the future is more bleak than the present. Old men, who gave their best years in the cold and dark of the mines, sit with idle hands and puzzle over the blow fate has dealt them and their loved ones. These men who mined coal so that smokestacks sent sable plumes to the skies and made the wheels of industry hum, now are too old to learn another trade. There is nothing for them to do but stay as long as the mines run, even part time, and take the pay envelopes that grow thinner and thinner.

Even more tragic is the plight of the younger men who went into the mines as lads. Few of them are fitted for other occupations, even if jobs were to be had. The dire condition of the women and children tear at your heart. Their drab present only holds a darker future.

To those of us who live in God's sunshine, the lot of the coal miner seems dangerous and dispiriting, at best. The reaction of us who breathe fresh air to the miner's mode of life is best told by a poet:

God, we don't like to complain;
We know the mine is no lark,
But there's the pools from the rain,
And there's the cold and the dark.

God, you don't know what it is, You in Your well-lighted sky, Watching the meteors whiz, Warm with the sun always by.

God, if You had but the moon Stuck in your cap for a lamp, Even You'd tire of it soon, Down in the cold and the damp.

Nothing but darkness above, Nothing that moves but the cars; God, if You wish for our love, Fling us a handful of stars.

Mr. Speaker, the coal miners do not complain of their lot, hard as it is, so long as they have work. My sole purpose is to give them work—the only kind of work most of them know how to do. I ask you to consider my bill to enable further investigation and research into the possibilities of coal. Once set to work, science always stands better than an even chance of performing another industrial miracle. And it seems that nothing short of an industrial miracle will enable "king coal" to recapture his high place in the financial and industrial affairs of the Nation.

This proposed research is constructive, not costly. The cost would be a tiny fraction of far less worthy projects, which hold no prospect of paying any dividends. And if science discovers new and wider uses for coal, the cost would be inconsequential in comparison with the contribution to the country at large.

Coal has given us much. Now coal asks for little. All coal asks is a chance to render even more service. All I ask is fair play for coal and all it has meant to America.

In the name of the coal miners of America, and their wives and children, I appeal to you gentlemen to give favorable consideration to this measure which holds the possibilities of rehabilitating the coal industry, which already has contributed so much toward making America great and still hides potentialities of "black magic."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous special order, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Patman] is recognized for 20 minutes.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP OF THE 12 FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is my belief that the Federal Reserve System is performing a governmental function and should be just as much a part of the Government itself as the United States Treasury. It is, to my mind, absolutely wrong for private banks to own the Federal Reserve banking system and thereby influence the price of money, which determines the value of all labor, commodities, goods, and services. It would be just as reasonable for the Interstate Commerce Commission to be owned and controlled by railroad owners or the Federal Trade Commission to be owned and controlled by the private corporations of the country or for the Federal Communications Commission to be owned and controlled by the radio-broadcasting companies.

SYSTEM USED AGAINST INTEREST OF PEOPLE IN PAST

The Federal Reserve System has many times demonstrated that it can be used against the interest of the people through deflationary practices and policies inaugurated by it. This System has demonstrated to the people that it cannot be relied upon to operate in their interest, but has more consistently operated in the interest of the private banks of the country. The panic of 1920, which was caused solely by the Federal Reserve banking system, has not been forgotten; neither have the panics and depressions in subsequent years, which were caused by the System, been forgotten.

CAUSED DEPRESSION OF 1937

June 15, 1936, the World War veterans were paid a large This wide distribution of needed purchasing sum of money. power would have been very helpful toward putting this country back in a prosperous condition had it not been for the fact that the Federal Reserve System caused the reserve requirements of banks to be raised, which, in effect, destroyed $3,000,000,000 in money. This was done on the pretense that the payment of between one billion and two billion to veterans might possibly cause too much expansion of the currency. Further, much of the gold was sterilized, which was also deflationary. It required many months for the country to recover from the shock that was caused by these two drastically deflationary and unwise acts of the Federal Reserve Board. The System has been often used to deflate, but I do not recall a time when it was used for expanding the credit of the country.

TWELVE BANKS AND TWENTY-FIVE BRANCHES

The Federal Reserve banking system is composed of 12 Federal Reserve banks, with 25 branches. All national banks are required to be members and State banks may become members, but membership is not compulsory. Each bank that is a member is required to subscribe for a small amount of stock in the Federal Reserve bank in the Federal Reserve district in which the bank is located. The 6,000 national banks and the 1,000 State banks belonging to this System have invested $134,000,000 in stock in these 12 banks. On this stock they receive 6-percent dividend annually. The Government does not own a penny of the stock.

PRIVATE BANKS SHOULD NOT OWN SYSTEM THAT ISSUES NATION'S CURRENCY

Since the Federal Reserve banking system should be a part of the Government and should not be owned exclusively by private banks and operated in their interest, Congress should pass a law reimbursing these banks for the $134,000,000 that they have invested in stock, thereby divesting private banking institutions of any ownership whatsoever in the Federal Reserve System and cause these banks to be operated by the Government in the interest of all the people and not necessarily in the banking interest, unless it is also in the interest of the general welfare.

FIVE-BILLION-DOLLAR PROFIT ON PURCHASE

If Congress paid the banks the $134,000,000 stock, the Government would acquire the assets of these 12 banks as follows:

Total_______15,900,000,000

When the Government acquires the banks they will be charged with the following liabilities:

Federal Reserve notes outstanding $5,000,000,000 Deposits of member banks 10,000,000

The $5,000,000,000 Federal Reserve notes are Government obligations, although issued by the Federal Reserve banks, which are privately owned. This $5,000,000,000 will never have to be retired or paid, because the money will always be needed in circulation so this amount will be, in effect, profit to the Government.

When these banks are acquired by the Government, interest that is paid on the Government bonds held by these banks should go into the Treasury if it is paid at all. A change should be made that would permit these banks, after they are owned by the Government, to acquire by purchase Government bonds and other securities issued by the Government in a way that it will not disrupt our financial or economic system; that is, acquire them gradually.

THERE IS $44,000,000,000 AVAILABLE, YET WE PAY $1,000,000,000 A YEAR INTEREST

All the gold and silver when these banks are owned by the Government should be delivered to the Federal Reserve banking system. With this enormous gold reserve of \$16,-000,000,000 which the Government now owns, Government credit or currency could be safely issued upon this gold to the extent of \$40,000,000,000, or $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 1, which is equivalent to a 40-percent gold base. Even the most orthodox money economist in the Nation will admit that a 40-percent gold base is sufficient-in fact, it is high. Four billion dollars could be issued under existing laws on the enormous silver reserve. So there is \$44,000,000,000 that the Federal Reserve banking system, Government owned, could safely issue. The additional currency would not be printed, as it would not be needed, but bookkeeping credits would be used as they are now used by the banks. We continue to borrow money and pay interest under these conditions.

The point is: Why should the Government borrow money from the banks? In other words, purchase an inferior credit and pay them an interest rate on it when the Government can safely issue $44,000,000,000 in credit upon a gold and silver reserve which it now owns.

GOVERNMENT BONDS ARE INTEREST-BEARING CURRENCY

United States Government bonds are nothing more nor less than interest-bearing currency. It occurs to me as being wrong for the Government to pay banks a bonus or a subsidy in order that it may use its own Government credit. I believe the time will come when this will be looked upon as idiotic.

BILL PROVIDING FOR GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS

I introduced on January 3, 1939, a bill, H. R. 195, which provides for Government ownership of the 12 Federal Reserve banks. This bill would make the Federal Reserve System an agency of Congress to create money and regulate the value thereof, as authorized by the Constitution of the United States. It provides that all the assets of these banks shall be the property of the United States; that all earnings shall be paid into the Treasury; that no banker shall be on the board of directors of any Federal Reserve bank; that the Federal Advisory Council now composed of private bankers should be abolished; that the Board of Governors shall constitute the Federal Open Market Committee instead of it being composed of the Board of Governors and private bankers, as at present; and that no officer or director shall receive an annual salary in excess of $25,000.

I have had a similar bill pending in Congress for many years. Many other Members of the House are coauthors of this bill. At the last session of Congress, in 1938, the Banking and Currency Committee of the House conducted hearings on this bill. These hearings, consisting of 508 pages, constitute a full discussion of this subject on both sides.

FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS HAVE NOT PAID INTEREST AS LAW REQUIRES

When the Federal Reserve Bank Act was passed in 1913 it contained a provision in section 16 relative to the payment of interest on Federal Reserve notes. I am going to show you now where these banks owe the United States Government more money in taxes or interest than the $134,000,000 invested in stock. Section 16 of the Federal Reserve Bank Act of 1913 stated that—

The Board, acting through the Federal Reserve agent, shall have the right to grant in whole or in part, or to reject entirely the application of any Federal Reserve bank for Federal Reserve notes; but to the extent that such application may be granted the Federal Reserve Board shall, through its local Federal Reserve agent, supply Federal Reserve notes to the banks so applying, and such bank shall be charged—with the amount of notes issued to it and shall pay such rate of interest as may be established by the Federal Reserve Board on only that amount of such notes which equals the total amount of its outstanding Federal Reserve notes less the amount of gold or gold certificates held by the Federal Reserve agent as collateral security.

I hope you get this-

According to that law, which is still in effect, when a Federal Reserve bank had issued to it Federal Reserve notes, which are currency, and this Federal Reserve bank put up 40 percent in gold or gold certificates and the balance in eligible paper, the bank was required to pay an interest rate fixed by the Federal Reserve Board on that difference of 60 percent; but up to this good day that law has never been complied with.

These Federal Reserve banks are using the credit of this Nation absolutely free, without any charge whatsoever.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and to insert therein certain excerpts in connection with the remarks I have made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. So I state that these Federal Reserve banks owe the Government now probably twice as much on that interest as the $134,000,000 of stock.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. How does the gentleman account for the fact that the currency in circulation, as shown by the Treasury statement, the Federal Reserve notes, are decreasing right now at a time when money is so badly needed, and how does the gentleman account for the fact that loans to brokers are increasing by the tens of millions of dollars a month at a time when the country is in sore need of money.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman has asked two questions; the first question about the decrease of Federal Reserve notes. Possibly other forms of currency are increasing, I do not know. I have not looked into that feature of it, but there is only a certain amount of currency that will remain in circulation anyway, just enough to meet the demands of the people. If any more is put into circulation, it just goes back to the bank vaults and from the bank vault to the Federal Reserve, and from the Federal Reserve out of circulation.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Is it the gentleman's idea that there is no demand for currency at this time?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; there is a demand for currency and the demand for actual currency is always met because you have to have it to meet the daily transactions.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Is it the gentleman's idea that Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Is it the gentleman's idea that when one of these member banks decides not to make a loan or turns down an application from a business concern that that is meeting a currency demand?

Mr. PATMAN. You are talking about the issuance of credits now, and since 1929 the loans have decreased $21,000,-000,000. It was $41,000,000,000 and now it is down to $20,000,-000,000 and that means destroying $21,000,000,000 of circulating medium. If the people paid their debts we would not have a circulating medium.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Does not the issuance of credit precede the issuance of currency?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Do they not take the eligible paper and receive the currency and if they do not give the credit, the currency is not issued.

Mr. PATMAN. That is right. Under the old law the bank could issue about ten dollars to every one it had, and under the present law about 6 to 1. Under the old law, when a bank could issue 10 to 1 and people were doing business with that bank, knowing the situation and knowing that the bank was issuing $10 to every $1 they had, if the bank went broke they expected to take their loss. Nobody would protect them because they were depending on that bank and upon the officials who were conducting it. It is quite different now. Now the Government is behind them, and if a bank issues six dollars to every one it has, or whatever it can issue, depending upon the bank or the city in which the bank is located, if that bank gets into difficulties it can take its United States bonds to the Federal Reserve bank and get currency issued on them in order to pay the depositors, and the laws have been so amended that the Government of the United States is behind the banks of the country today and, you might say, guaranteeing there will be no loss. Therefore, if there is an expansion of 6 to 1, why should the banks get the benefit of that expansion? Why should not the Government get the benefit of it? The Government is a stand-by agency that is waiting to take care of it in the event of a run or an emergency. It is not like it used to be under the old law, and therefore, according to present laws and practices, the Government is entitled to that expansion. And if we were to avail ourselves of the opportunity of taking the benefit of that expansion, it would mean more than enough to retire the entire national debt, and eventually the debt of the States, counties, cities, and political subdivisions, which could be carried at a very low rate of interest.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. And the interest, in turn, then would go to the people of the United States and to the Government-owned banks rather than to private individuals.

Mr. PATMAN. Yes. The Federal Reserve banks are not really in the banking business. They do not operate as private banks operate. They operate more as the Treasury of the United States or as a part of the Treasury of the United States. They are engaged in a governmental function and should be operated by the Government.

HOW FEDERAL RESERVE NOTES ARE STORED

In answer to my question:

How are Federal Reserve notes stored in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; that is, with reference to keeping them all together or separating them into different sections for different banks?

Director Hall answered under date of February 20, 1939:

These notes are stored in the Federal Reserve vault, located in the main Bureau building, separated into different sections for the different banks. This vault is in the joint custody of representatives from the Federal Reserve Board, the Public Debt Service, and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

AMOUNT OF FEDERAL RESERVE NOTES ON HAND

In answer to my question:

The amount of Federal Reserve notes on hand at this time in your custody for each Federal Reserve bank?

Director Hall stated:

The amount of notes of each Federal Reserve bank on hand in the Federal Reserve vault as of February 17, 1939, was as follows:

the second secon
Boston	$311, 720, 000
New York	620, 220, 000

HOW NOTES DISTRIBUTED

In answer to my question

Are these notes shipped directly by you to a Federal Reserve bank, or to whom do you deliver them and upon whose order?

Director Hall replied:

Federal Reserve notes are forwarded by the custodians of the Federal Reserve vault to the various Federal Reserve banks, or branches thereof, on order of the Federal Reserve Board through the Comptroller of the Currency.

WHY CERTAIN DENOMINATIONS OF CERTAIN NOTES

In answer to my questions, Mr. William H. McReynolds, Administrative Assistant to the Secretary of the United States Treasury, on March 6, 1939, replied as follows:

Item 5: You ask why Federal Reserve notes are not issued in denominations below $10. Paragraph 9 of section 16 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, authorizes the printing of such quantities Reserve Act, as amended, authorizes the printing of such quantities of Federal Reserve notes of the denominations of $5, $10, $20, $50, $100, $500, $1,000, $5,000, and $10,000 as may be required to supply the Federal Reserve banks. It will be noted the minimum denomination fixed by law is $5. Moreover, silver certificates supply the $1 denominational requirements and United States notes supply the $2 requirements. During the fiscal year 1938 the Federal Reserve banks paid into circulation $78,059,000 Federal Reserve notes of the $5 denomination.

Item 6: You ask why silver certificates are not issued in denominations larger than they are now issued. Section 12 of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934 authorizes the President to issue silver certificates in such denominations as he may prescribe against any silver bullion, silver, or standard silver dollars in the Treasury not then held for the redemption of any outstanding certificates. They are now issued in denominations of $1, $5, and $10. They are not issued in other denominations because other denominational requirements are met by other kinds of currency, and for the further reason that these denominations best lend themselves to putting silver certificates in circulation.

SENATE

FRIDAY, MAY 26, 1939

(Legislative day of Friday, May 19, 1939)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Z@Barney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Heavenly Father, in whom we live and move and have our being, we come again to cast ourselves upon Thee, for Thou carest for us and Thy love is ever constant, knowing neither end nor change. Be gracious unto our land and bless with bounteousness the fruits thereof; be very patient with Thy children lest we lose patience with ourselves; and to all our honored leaders grant an ever clearer vision and an ever deeper knowledge of Thy laws until the measure of our freedom shall be determined only by Thy will and purpose for us as a nation.

Comfort all who mourn and are bereaved; bind us ever closer to each other in the bonds of holy fellowship, and, though we sometimes stray in willfulness from Thee, help us to remember that Thine amazing love brings Thee over the mountains of our misery into the wilderness where we have wandered; seek until it finds; bears us in Thy strong embrace, and brings us home rejoicing. In the Master's name we ask it. Amen.

AMENDMENT OF LAW FOR APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES IN CONGRESS

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, on June 18, 1929, Congress finally approved the so-called Reapportionment Act, which provides for automatic decennial reapportionments in connection with the automatic decennial censuses.

In the act passed June 18, 1929, there is a timetable, so to speak, which indicates when the census is to be taken, when it is to be made applicable to reapportionment, and when the President shall report to Congress in respect to the census and the reapportionment.

Since that time the twentieth amendment to the Constitution of the United States has been ratified. That amendment changes the date upon which sessions of Congress convene. As a result, we confront the anomalous situation that the existing census and reapportionment law as it stands requires the President to report upon the census and the reapportionment before the census has been taken.

I ask consent to introduce a bill to amend the act of 1929 merely to revise the calendar, so that the report of the President may follow the taking of the census. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be received and referred as requested by the Senator from Michigan.

(See Senate bill 2505, introduced by Mr. Vandenberg and referred to the Committee on Commerce, under its appropriate heading.)

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

On motion by Mr. George, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 135) granting pensions to veterans of wars and campaigns who are permanently and totally disabled, not the result of their own felonious misconduct, and it was referred to the Committee on Finance.

FINANCIAL REHABILITATION OF RAILROADS—AMENDMENT

Mr. CLARK of Missouri submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1869) to protect interstate commerce from the dangers of unsound financial structures and to establish improved procedures and standards for financial rehabilitation of railroads engaged in interstate commerce, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, JUSTICE, ETC.—
AMENDMENT

Mr. BARBOUR submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for salaries and expenses for certain emergencies, under the Federal Bureau of Investigation, from $300,000 to $750,000. intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6392) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Department of Commerce for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

THE SUBMARINE "SQUALUS" DISASTER

Mr. TOBEY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 137), which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is requested to make a full and complete report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date with respect to (1) the cause and nature of the submarine Squalus disaster, (2) the efforts made to rescue the officers and crew of such submarine, (3) whether or not sufficient equipment was available for the purpose of carrying out such rescue work, (4) the advisability of the Government's procuring additional equipment, including diving bells and vessels to carry such bells, for submarine rescue work, and (5) any other information which the Secretary may have which might enable the Congress to take action to prevent similar disasters in the future.

GERMANY'S IMMIGRATION QUOTA-STATEMENT BY JOHN CECIL

[Mr. Reynolds asked and obtained leave to have printed in the Record a statement by John Cecil, president of the American Immigration Conference Board of New York City, before the Senate Immigration Committee in opposition to Senate Joint Resolution 64, which appears in the Appendix.] COMPULSORY BLOCK BOOKING AND BLIND SELLING OF MOTION-PICTURE FILMS

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take from the table and consider my motion, which was entered on the 20th day of last March, to discharge the Committee on Interstate Commerce from further consideration of S. 280, a bill to prohibit and prevent the trade practices known as "compulsory block booking" and "blind selling" in the leasing of motion-picture films in interstate and foreign commerce.

The necessity for this motion lies in the fact that this bill has been bedeviled with more opposition, both revealed and concealed, than the hero of Pilgrim's Progress encountered on his slow and painful journey from earth to heaven. A blindfolded, crippled snail on crutches could have traveled farther in purgatory in 6 seconds than this bill has traveled since it was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce 6 months ago.

For a parallel to the inaction which has blighted the bill, it is necessary to go to the famous chancery case of Jarndyce against Jarndyce, immortalized in Bleak House by Charles Dickens—a case in which Miss Flite, one of the litigants, was, by the irritation of the law's unreasonable and unjust delay, finally reduced to insanity and impelled to mutter as she daily entered the courtroom in which nothing ever happened, "I expect to get judgment on judgment day."

Our experience in this matter has taught us that not only in fairy stories and proverbs and wisdom books is truth stranger than fiction. On Capitol Hill when the Congress is in session, fact outruns fiction, performance annihilates expectation, and realization laughs the plans of the legislator and the wishes of the public to scorn every day and all day long.

In support of this sweeping assertion, the attention of the Senate is very respectfully invited to a most extraordinary series of facts and circumstances concerning the bill which is, in substance, identical with other bills that have been before this body almost continuously for more than 11 years.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NEELY. I gladly yield to the able Senator from

Mr. NEELY. I gladly yield to the able Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Is the bill to which the Senator refers similar to the measure passed by the Senate during the last session?

Mr. NEELY. It is identical with it from beginning to end. Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McNARY. The unfinished business is Senate bill 1869, is it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. McNARY. This motion to discharge is on the table. The Senator from West Virginia has made a motion to proceed to its consideration. Is not that correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct. If the motion of the Senator from West Virginia should prevail, the motion to discharge would be the business before the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. Yes. It is proper that the Senate should proceed to consider the motion to discharge; but that motion has not been made as I understand has not been made, as I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator to make a double-barreled motion—to discharge the committee, and to pass the bill.

Mr. NEELY. No. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's motion is to discharge the committee from the consideration of the bill?

Mr. NEELY. That is correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senate should do that, it would then be in order for it to take up the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the proper motion now is a motion to proceed to consider the motion to discharge. If that motion should prevail, then the question would be whether the Senate should discharge the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon is correct.

Mr. McNARY. There must be two separate motions. I raise the point only in order to have the parliamentary situation correct. The Senator could not properly move to discharge the committee and pass the bill at the same time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; he could not do that. Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the motion come up automatically? Is it not a privileged matter under the rules?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does not.

Mr. NORRIS. It has to lie over a day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has already laid over several days; but the Senate met today after a recess, and there was no morning hour for the transaction of routine business.

Mr. NORRIS. We have not adjourned, then, since notice of the motion was given?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate has adjourned numbers of times; but the motion has been passed over by unanimous consent, or by some kind of consent it was placed on the table subject to call.

The parliamentarian advises the Chair that the motion went over by unanimous consent a number of times, and a little later was placed on the table subject to call.

Mr. BARKLEY. It was placed on what is known as the Table Calendar, which makes it subject to a motion to proceed to consider the motion to discharge the committee.

A further parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. If the motion to consider this motion should be agreed to, would it displace the unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. For the time being, it would. Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, let me assure the Senate that if the motion to discharge the committee prevails, no attempt will be made, so far as I am concerned, to have the bill considered on its merits today. I am simply striving to induce the Senate to discharge the committee, so that at some time between now and judgment day a motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill may be properly made in this body.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. NEELY. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. Am I to understand that the Senator is not pressing his motion to discharge; that he simply wishes to state his position?

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I most certainly and sincerely desire action on my motion to discharge the committee.

Mr. McNARY. I thought the Senator said he had no desire to displace the unfinished business.

Mr. NEELY. I have no desire to displace it, except for the limited time that may be consumed by the debate and a vote on my motion.

That the Senate may know beyond a doubt that the general public, from coast to coast, is intensely interested in this antimonopolistic measure and is insisting upon its passage. the names of the religious, educational, economic, social, and general welfare organizations which are vigorously supporting the bill are again announced, as follows: American Association of University Women; American Home Economics Association; American Baptist Publication Society; Associated Film Audiences; Association for Childhood Education; Board of Temperance and Social Welfare of the Disciples of Christ; Catholic Boys' Brigade of the United States, Inc.; Catholic Central Verein of America; Catholic Daughters of America; Catholic Order of Foresters; Civic Club of Philadelphia; Committee on Moral and Social Welfare of the Lutheran Church in America; Council of Women for Home Missions; Editorial Council of the Religious Press; Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America; Girls' Friendly Society of United States of America; International Order of the King's Daughters and Sons, Inc.; Knights of Columbus; Massachusetts Civic League; Motion Picture Research Council; National Board of Young Women's Christian Associations; National Congress of Parents and Teachers; National Council of Catholic Women; National Council of Protestant Episcopal Churches; National Education Association; National Grange; National Motion Picture League, Inc.; National Sentinels; National Woman's Christian Temperance Union; National Women's Trade-Union League of America; Service Star Legion, Inc.; the parents and teachers organizations of 46 of the 48 States in the Union.

The support of the bill by these important organizations is supplemented by the support of many thousands of prominent men and women of whom the following deserve special mention: Ada U. Comstock, Radcliffe College, Cambridge, Mass.; W. A. Neilson, Smith College, Northampton, Mass.; Mary E. Woolley, former president of Holyoke College, Holyoke, Mass.; David A. On the 27th day of February—11 years ago—the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce began hearings on S. 1667, by Senator Brookhart, which, like S. 280, was designed to prevent block booking and blind selling of motion-picture films. Those hearings, which were concluded on the 2d day of March 1928, constitute a 354-page record which lies on the desk before me.

In March 1934 the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce conducted hearings on H. R. 6097, the aim of which was to prohibit the nefarious trade practices known as block booking and blind selling. The record of those hearings contains 76 pages.

In February 1936 the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, through a subcommittee consisting of Senators Barkley, Benson, Davis, Metcalf, and Neely, conducted hearings on S. 3012, which is almost verbatim with Senate bill 280, to which the pending motion refers. The record of those hearings contains 218 pages.

The House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in March 1936 devoted 9 days to hearings on H. R. 4757 and H. R. 6472, the objectives of which were identical with those of S. 280. The record of those hearings contains 526 pages.

During each of the last two sessions of the Congress the Committee on Interstate Commerce favorably reported to the Senate a bill that contained every important sentence and syllable which appears in S. 280. On one of these occasions there were but two votes in the committee against the bill and on the other there was but one.

During the last session of the Congress, after prolonged and innumerable difficulties and delays, the Senate considered S. 153, which is the immediate progenitor of S. 280 now before us. Many of the most famous Members of the Senate participated in the debate on that measure. For example, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. Borahl, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Vandenberg], and various other able Members of this body discussed the merits of the bill which, at the conclusion of the debate, was passed by almost unanimous consent.

On the 4th day of January 1939, S. 280, identical with the bill which the Senate passed a year ago, was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. On the following day I telephoned the office of the chairman of the committee, Mr. Wheeler, in an effort to communicate to him a request for early action on the bill. I was courteously informed by one of the Senator's secretaries that he was not available. During the following week I improved an opportunity to make my request to the Senator in a brief conversation which we held on the floor of the Senate. Senator Wheeler informed me that my appeal would receive proper consideration. But unfortunately for the bill the committee did not meet until the 27th day of January.

In that meeting I requested the committee to report the bill without additional hearings and without reference to a subcommittee, and invited attention to the fact that numerous hearings had been conducted in previous sessions of the Congress on identical or similar bills. But the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Barkley] insisted that hearings should be held and that a subcommittee should be appointed to conduct them. The Senator, among other things, stated in support of his demand that there were new members on the committee who should be afforded an opportunity to familiarize themselves with the proposed legislation. Over my protest, Senator Barkley's request was granted, and on the 2d day of February Chairman Wheeler appointed a subcommittee consisting of Senators Smith, chairman, Barkley, White, Tobey, and Neely to conduct the hearings.

On the day after the subcommittee was appointed I endeavored in vain to communicate with Senator Smith by telephone for the purpose of requesting him to convene the subcommittee and proceed to conduct the hearings which had been ordered on the bill. During the next few weeks, on two different occasions, in face-to-face conversations I requested Senator Smith to begin the hearings at an early date. He twice assured me that he hoped to begin within a few days. After many weeks of absolute inactivity by the subcommittee, I appealed to Chairman Wheeler to use his influence with Senator Smith in behalf of the holding of the hearings which had been ordered. The Senator patiently listened to my request, but indicated that he considered the responsibility rested entirely with the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. NEELY. Gladly.

Mr. WHEELER. I did speak to the Senator from South Carolina. I think I told him that the Senator had complained to me about getting a hearing, and asked him about it. He stated at that time that he had been busy with the Committee on Agriculture, and said he thought he could get to it in a few days, I think the following Monday.

Mr. NEELY. And the Senator from Montana kindly communicated Senator Smith's response to me, but on the following Monday, as usual, no action was taken by the subcommittee.

On the 20th day of March, as a last resort, I filed a notice of the pending motion to discharge the committee from further consideration of the bill. But before this motion came to a vote, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Barkley] informed me that if I would not press the motion, he would endeavor to prevail upon Senator Smith to begin the hearings without further delay. I assented to Senator Barkley's proposal and, after some negotiations, he informed me that Senator Smith had assured him that hearings would be ordered on a certain day.

Although the hearings did not begin until 3 or 4 days after the time designated, the subcommittee was at last convened upon the call of Senator Smith, the chairman, on the 3d of April—61 days after the bill had been referred to the subcommittee for the purpose of conducting hearings thereon.

Senator Barkley, who, in my opinion, is almost exclusively responsible for the hearings having been ordered, attended the subcommittee's first meeting and participated in the proceedings. But the subcommittee held 12 additional sessions during the next 14 days. Never after the first of the 13 hearings was the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Barkley] seen in the subcommittee room during the consideration of the bill. The Senator's keen interest in the hearings on the bill apparently subsided immediately after the subcommittee had entered into the long, laborious, and useless task of once more taking evidence, at the expense of the taxpayers, that had been fully submitted of record several times before.

The distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Tobey], who is one of the new and worthy members of the committee and presumably one of those for whose benefit the Senator from Kentucky insisted that hearings should be held, was, by important official duties, prevented from ever participating in any of the 13 sessions which the subcommittee held.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NEELY. I yield.
Mr. TOBEY. When this meeting was held I was unable to be present on account of my illness in New Hampshire.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, let me assure the Senator that I was not complaining, and I am sincerely sorry that he was ill. He is a very conscientious and capable member of the committee, and undoubtedly would not have been absent had it been possible for him to be present.

Mr. CONNALLY and Mr. BARKLEY addressed the Chair. The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. NEELY. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. In all justice and fairness to the Senator from Kentucky, does not the Senator from West Virginia realize that he has a vast amount of varied matters-

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I have not failed to consider that fact. But if a Senator is too busy to act as a member of a subcommittee he can always resign.

Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. CONNALLY addressed the Chair. The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield?

Mr. NEELY. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I do not ask that the Senator yield. I will discuss the matter in my own time after he concludes.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, with due respect to all the other members of the subcommittee, the able Senator from Maine [Mr. White], who is most faithful and diligent in the discharge of his committee duties, and I alone conducted the hearings at which approximately three-fourths of the 651 pages of evidence in the record of this last hearing were taken.

On the 17th day of April the subcommittee concluded hearings on the bill and adjourned sine die.

Last Tuesday, after vainly waiting 36 days subsequent to the completion of the hearings for the subcommittee, either favorably or adversely, to report the bill, I ascertained from an employee in Senator Smith's office that he was in South Carolina, where he was detained by the unfortunate illness of his wife. Thereupon I sent him the following telegram:

MAY 23, 1939.

Hon, Ellison D. SMITH,

Care of Mr. Alfred Lawton, Florence, S. C.: Record of hearings on anti-block-booking bill printed and de-greed. To afford chance to have this matter considered by Senate before adjournment, will you not kindly wire authority some other member subcommittee to assemble it immediately and report the bill, whether favorably or adversely, to full committee with understanding your vote shall be recorded as you desire. Thirty-six days have passed since hearings were completed. Any further delay will nullify all subcommittee's work so far as this session is concerned. I sincerely hope Mrs. Smith will be speedily and completely healed and that you may be able to return to service here at an early date.

At the expiration of 26 hours after sending this message I had received no reply. I then requested the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] to join me in holding a meeting of the subcommittee for the purpose of reporting the bill to the full committee. Senator WHITE responded that he would confer with his Republican colleague [Mr. Tobey] concerning the matter and inform me of their decision. About 3 o'clock last Wednesday, Senator White graciously assured me that he and Senator Tobey, or at least one of them would attend any meeting of the subcommittee at which I might be able to produce either Senator Smith or Senator BARKLEY. I immediately communicated the facts of the situation to Senator Barkley at his desk and urged him to join in a meeting of the subcommittee for at least 5 minutes in order to make it possible for a vote to be taken on the bill.

Senator Barkley declined to do this, but stated that he would take the matter up with Senator Smith, or with his office. This response was wholly unsatisfactory to me.

But yesterday morning I again conferred with Senator BARKLEY who informed me that he had sent a telegram to Senator Smith, in which he had, in substance, suggested to the Senator that he request some other member of the subcommittee to convene it for the purpose of making a report on the bill. My fear, born of much experience in the matter, prompted me to ask the Senator from Kentucky whether he would agree to join one of the Republican members of the subcommittee and me in a meeting next Monday to vote on the bill, provided Senator Smith failed to answer his telegram, as he had failed to answer mine. This Senator BARKLEY refused to do.

Senators, you are now thoroughly acquainted with the naked, unblushing, unpleasant facts in this case.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NEELY. Yes, gladly.

Mr. WHITE. I rise not to contradict anything that the Senator has said, but simply to amplify his statement.

When the Senator from West Virginia asked me if the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Tobey] and I would meet with him to constitute a quorum of the committee, I stated that I disliked to take action in the absence of the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. NEELY. That is true. Mr. WHITE. But I told him I would consult with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Tobey] and let the Senator from West Virginia know definitely later. I talked the situation over with the Senator from New Hampshire, and I finally told the Senator from West Virginia that the Senator from New Hampshire and I were not willing to constitute a majority of the subcommittee in the absence of the chairman but that, if the other two of the majority members of the subcommittee would meet, either the Senator from New Hampshire or I would meet with them in order to constitute a quorum.

Mr. NEELY. May I inquire of the able Senator whether I have inaccurately stated any fact concerning his conversation with me?

Mr. WHITE. The Senator did not.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, if the patriarch Job, who presided over the famous trial of the ponderous issue, "If a man die, shall he live again?" had been afflicted with the slings and arrows of legislative delays which I have endured since I introduced this bill, he never would have won his enviable reputation of being the most patient man the world has ever

Let me appeal to the Senate to adopt my motion and thus bring this proposed legislation forth from the subcommittee's prison house as Lazarus was brought forth from the tomb. Let us proclaim that this important measure shall be promptly and fairly considered by this body, in keeping with the best traditions of the Senate; in the typical American spirit in which problems are habitually solved, burdens are successfully borne and duties are cheerfully done.

The multibillionaire Moving Picture Trust is on one side of this question and the American people are on the other. Let us this day righteously choose whom we shall serve. On the roll call, let us vote for the people; for the redress of their wrongs; for the preservation of their rights, and the promotion of the welfare of all that is dear to their hearts.

Mr. BARKLEY obtained the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. Neely] a question. The Senator made the statement a while ago that there was some complaint about not having a hearing during the time I was a member of the subcommittee.

Mr. NEELY. Yes, that complaint was made by Mr. Pettijohn, who is the general counsel for the Motion Picture Trust, or the so-called Hays organization.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Pettijohn said that former Senator Metcalf was not present at the evening meeting. I remember that we were about to adjourn the afternoon meeting, around 5 o'clock, and the motion-picture representatives came to us and said they had some additional witnesses to put on, and they asked me if I would wait and conduct the hearing so that those witnesses could make their statements and take an evening train home. I notice from the record that Mr. Pettijohn states that I conducted the hearing alone. Former Senator Metcalf was present throughout that hearing and was very faithful in his attendance. Furthermore, former Senator Metcalf was a member of the subcommittee which conducted hearings on Senate bill 1667 in 1928. At that time the subcommittee was hearing statements on the motion-picture bill, which the Senator from West Virginia

[Mr. Neely] later reintroduced. Former Senator Metcalf was very much interested in the bill. He made a statement just before the committee adjourned on February 28, 1936, at 8:35 p. m. He asked Mr. Mayhew, who was testifying, the following question:

Senator Mercalf. How many pictures have you found were not worth passing along for the people to see?

I would say that that occurred 20 minutes before we adjourned.

I was acting chairman of the subcommittee for the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY]. I stated:

Mrs. Bannerman just has one or two papers to be filed; you are asking to file a brief, as I understand.

Mr. Myers. It would be an analysis or correction.

Senator Davis. You can file it with the chairman. Mr. Myers. We will be very happy to. Senator Davis. And if you, Mr. Pettijohn, desire to file a brief Senator Davis. And if you, Mr. Pettijohn, desire to file a brief and review the testimony you have presented here or review the testimony presented by the proponents of the bill, you may do so.

Mr. Pettijohn. Mr. Chairman, we will desire to file nothing more, but we would like to see any brief they file as a record in rebuttal, and we will then, if we feel necessary, we will prepare and file a brief. We simply want to say that we are through now, unless they raise something in their brief which they want to file.

Senator Davis. Senator Neely will return next Tuesday.

There being no further business before the committee we will

There being no further business before the committee, we will stand adjourned.

(Whereupon, at 8:35 p. m., the subcommittee adjourned.)

That subcommittee held an evening session for the benefit of Mr. Pettijohn, who represented the motion-picture industry; and when Mr. Pettijohn says that he did not have an opportunity for a hearing, I present the record of the hearings of February 27 and 28, 1936, and the record of the later hearing in 1938, which, as the Senator from West Virginia says, covers 651 pages. I say that Mr. Pettijohn misstated the facts.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have no desire or intention to work myself into a "lather" over this motion.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield. Mr. WHEELER. I wish to make a very brief statement with reference to this proposed legislation.

The only statements which have been made have been with reference to the subcommittee. I wish to call attention to the following facts:

The bill came before the Interstate Commerce Committee many years ago. Former Senator Brookhart introduced it, and we held hearings on it. I do not believe it was reported by the committee at that time. I am not sure.

Mr. NEELY. It was not.

Mr. WHEELER. It was not reported. I think it was taken up at two different sessions. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] then reintroduced it, and I appointed a subcommittee consisting of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Davis], and other Senators whose names I do not remember.

Hearings were held at that particular time. The bill came to the floor of the Senate, passed the Senate, and went to the House; but nothing was done in the House.

The next year it came to the committee and was reported out without any hearings, if I am not mistaken. Then it came to the floor of the Senate. The Interstate Commerce Committee, and I as chairman, were criticized on the floor of the Senate because of the fact that no subcommittee was appointed to hold hearings. A representative of the industry came to me and said that the industry had some new facts, and that a hearing on the matter was desired. stated that the industry did not have a fair hearing when the matter first came up.

While I did not think it was necessary to have a new hearing, nevertheless, because of the fact that we were criticized for not having a hearing, because the representatives of the industry said they had some new facts to present, and because there were new members on the committee, I then said. We will bring up the question in the committee.'

When the committee met, it was suggested that a subcommittee be appointed. A motion was made to appoint a subcommittee, and a subcommittee was appointed. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is the ranking member of the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee. I asked him if he wanted to be appointed on a subcommittee, as I frequently do in connection with many subcommittees. He said he would like to be appointed upon that subcommittee, and I appointed him because of his position. I also appointed on the subcommittee the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Barkley], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], the author of the bill, and two Republican members.

In justice to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], it ought to be said that he was extremely busy with the Agricultural Committee at the beginning of the session, as every member of the Agricultural Committee knows. When the Senator from West Virginia complained to me about the delays, I went to the Senator from South Carolina and suggested to him that complaint had been made, and he said he would take the matter up at the earliest possible moment.

I understand that the Senator from South Carolina is now in South Carolina. His wife is ill, and that is the reason why he stated that he has not been able to give the matter consideration.

The Senator from West Virginia asked me to call a meeting of the full committee so that he might make a motion to discharge the subcommittee. I said to him that I hesitated to do that until the Senator from South Carolina returned to Washington, because I thought such action might reflect upon the Senator from South Carolina or upon other members of the committee. I felt that under those circumstances I would prefer to wait until the Senator from South Carolina returned. I assumed that he would return in a few

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I wish to make a very brief and very simple statement with respect to this matter.

As has been suggested, the bill has been before the Senate and the Congress for many years. It was introduced years ago by former Senator Brookhart, of Iowa. When he retired from the Senate, I think the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] took up the matter and has since been the author of such measures.

I voted for the bill in the committee and in the Senate. I may or may not vote for it when it comes up again. I make no commitment upon it. I have done everything in my power to aid the Senator from West Virginia in facilitating the consideration of the bill.

The bill went to the House in the last session, and was not acted upon by the committee. When the bill was reintroduced at this session I was approached by those interested in the motion-picture industry with the complaint that they had not had a hearing during the previous session. when the bill was reported, or had not had a sufficient hearing. I have forgotten whether they said that they had not had any hearing or that they had not had a sufficient hearing. However, the statement was that many persons desired to testify about the merits of the bill; and that was evidently true, because during the hearings many witnesses testified on both sides of the controversy.

I felt that the request for additional hearings was not an unreasonable request; and I went to the Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler], the chairman of the committee, and suggested that he appoint a subcommittee. In the meantime I told the Senator from West Virginia that I did not see how any harm could come from giving the representatives of the industry the right to be heard if they had any additional facts which they desired to submit to the committee. The Senator from Montana agreed that that was the proper procedure, and asked me if I would become chairman of the subcommittee, which I declined, because I really had more than I could do on other committees. Ever since I assumed the position which I now occupy in the Senate I have seriously contemplated asking to be relieved from service on all committees.

But for sentimental reasons, one of them being that of some of these committees I have been a member ever since I have been in the Senate and am near the top in rank, I hesitated and did not resign from these committees. One of the committee memberships of which I am proud is the Interstate Commerce Committee; another one is the Finance Committee; another one is the Committee on Banking and Currency. I declined to be chairman of the subcommittee, but, without my knowledge or consent and rather against my wishes, I was put on the subcommittee as a member.

I did approach the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] a number of times urging him to call the subcommittee to accord hearings. He advised me, what I already knew and I suppose what we all knew, that he was very much interested in the agricultural situation; that he had a bill of his own dealing with cotton, which I think was reported by the committee after hearings and after long deliberation; and that, in view of his earnest interest in that subject, he did not feel that he could call the Senate committee together until that matter had been disposed of by the committee.

After various delays and conferences, the subcommittee was called on the 3d of April. I attended the first day's hearings, and my recollection is that I was there once more, but whether I was or not is not important. I was chairman of a subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee which was holding hearings on some measures. I had an important bill relating to trust indentures before another subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee, which I had introduced last year and which I succeeded in having reported to the Senate but obtained no action upon it. Hearings were in progress before that subcommittee on my own measure, the trust indenture bill, which has subsequently passed the Senate, and is now in the House of Representatives. Hearings were in progress also by the full committee of the Interstate Commerce Committee on the railroad measure, which the Senate passed yesterday, and on another bill which the Senate has before it now as the un-

As a member of that committee, I tried to attend some of the hearings on the railroad subject. At the same time, the Committee on Foreign Relations was holding hearings on neutrality, which is a tremendously important subject, and I tried to attend those hearings. All of this probably convinces the Senate and me that I ought not to retain membership on these committees. Being a member of these committees, I have tried to divide my time among them, but because of these other matters I did not attend the hearings on this bill except for 1 or 2 days.

Those hearings were held from the 3d of April until the 17th of April. I have a copy of those hearings, containing 651 pages, which were printed day before yesterday and were then available for distribution to Senators. I tried to get a copy of them on the floor this morning, and then sent to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and obtained the copy which I have.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. The hearings became available and a hundred copies of them were delivered to my office last Tuesday morning about 11 o'clock.

Mr. BARKLEY. It was Tuesday, then, instead of Wednesday. The day before yesterday was Wednesday, instead of Tuesday. My statement may have been off 1 day. The point is that the hearings were not printed and available until yesterday or the day before that.

Mr. NEELY. Let me add that I telephoned an official of the Government Printing Office after the galley proofs of the hearings had been outstanding for about 3 weeks that if the bound volumes of the proceedings were not delivered at once I would be compelled to "burn up" on the Senate floor those responsible for further delay.

Mr. BARKLEY. Well, Mr. President, I am not interested in conflagrations. I am not responsible. I suppose the Senator means by that remark that there was some deliberate negligence on the part of the subcommittee in having the hearings printed. I know nothing about that. I know that in all hearings of importance such as this the manuscript is sent back to the witnesses in order that they may go over them and see whether any mistakes have been made. The Committee on Foreign Relations held long hearings, which they concluded about a month ago, but I do not think those hearings have been printed as yet. I have not seen a copy of them. I know my own questions were sent to me for correction, but I finally instructed the committee to go ahead and print them without sending them to me; that I was perfectly willing to risk the stenographers' accuracy. However, many witnesses like to go over their testimony.

Hearings have been held before many committees of the Senate practically coextensive with hearings on this particular bill, and they have not been printed. I do not think there is any invidious criticism properly to be leveled at the subcommittee, especially at the chairman of the subcommittee, because these hearings were not printed and available until this week.

From the time the hearings were concluded until day before yesterday nobody said anything to me about this bill. Nobody came to me with reference to it. Day before yesterday the Senator from West Virginia came to me here at my desk and said that unless the subcommittee considering this bill was called together by 2 o'clock the next day he intended to insist on his motion to discharge the committee. I told the Senator that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] left here because of the serious illness of his wife, that he advised me when he left that that was the reason for his departure-and he is still in South Carolina on that mission—that I did not think it was fair to the Senator from South Carolina to try to precipitate this matter in his absence, that he was absent on a mission that would take home any of us who had any regard for his family, and that I should like to wait until the Senator returned before taking any step in regard to the matter.

I also told the Senator from West Virginia that I tried to get in touch with the Senator from South Carolina. I tried to call his office Tuesday afternoon, but his office was closed. I got in touch with the office of Senator SMITH yesterday morning to find out where he was and where I could reach him. I was told to send a telegram to Florence, S. C., in care of Mr. Lawton and in care of the Postal Telegraph Co., which I did. I telegraphed the Senator from South Carolina yesterday morning and told him that the Senator from West Virginia was insisting on his motion to discharge the committee and asked him to let me know when he would return to Washington, or whether he was willing to authorize the ranking member of the subcommittee to call it together, or if he were coming back by next Monday would he call a meeting of the subcommittee. This morning the secretary of Senator Smith called my office and said that Senator Smith was out in the country, where they had to mail telegrams to him from Florence, S. C.; that he was returning here Sunday or would leave South Carolina Sunday, and would be here Monday, and that he would regard it as somewhat of a reflection upon him, under these circumstances, if this motion were adopted.

That is all there is to it, Mr. President. I certainly have no desire to delay consideration of this measure, and I am not going to discuss it on its merits. I did not want to go on the subcommittee, and I was appointed without my consent. I appreciated the compliment paid me by the Senator from Montana in putting me on the committee, but I knew in advance I could not devote the time to it that would be expected by the Senator from West Virginia and by everyone else who was interested in the proposed legislation.

It seems to me there is no reason to adopt this motion now. The Senator from South Carolina will be here Monday. The Committee on Interstate Commerce has been in session frequently since the hearings were concluded. No motion was made before that committee, as I understand, to discharge the subcommittee, although the Senator from West Virginia 2 or 3 days ago did ask the Senator from Montana to call a special meeting of the committee to enable him to make such a motion.

It seems to me that before the Senate of the United States should adopt this motion taking away from the chairman of the subcommittee and the subcommittee consideration of this bill, upon which hearings were had, which were printed and available 3 days ago, the Senate ought to give the full Committee on Interstate Commerce an opportunity to determine whether it wants to discharge its own subcommittee.

Every full committee has complete control of all its subcommittees. The subcommittees are the agents and servants of the full committee. The full committee can discharge a subcommittee or it can give it an order under instructions to report to the full committee within 5 days or within 2 days.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator know whether in the last hearings, which were printed about 2 days ago, there is anything new that has not been developed during the last 10 years since this bill has been under consideration?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think no new witnesses have testified.

Mr. NORRIS. Some of the previous witnesses have probably died of old age.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know, although it may be true, that some witnesses who testified 10 years ago—I do not know anything about the hearings 10 years ago—are now dead.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the Senator think, inasmuch as this is a bill that has been heard so many times, that it ought not to be considered in the same way as an absolutely new measure?

Mr. BARKLEY. I grant that; but on important legislation such as this, involving vast numbers of the people and involving an important industry, does the Senator in his conscience—and I always have respect for the Senator's view, and he knows that I have for him very affectionate regard—think that the committee should deliberately refuse to hold hearings, or grant hearings, hearings having been held heretofore, if the committee has any reason to believe that new facts might be developed?

Mr. NORRIS. If there is something new, I should say that is all right.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not certain whether or not anything new in the way of facts was brought out.

Mr. NORRIS. This is a bill, however, that is identical with one that has already passed the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. We cannot consider a bill of that sort a new proposition.

Mr. BARKLEY. I agree to that; but now we are up against the fact that hearings were held. Whether or not the committee was subject to criticism, hearings were held. They were held for 12 days. They have been printed. They have been available since Tuesday. The chairman of the subcommittee certainly is entitled to give an excuse or reason for being absent. He will be here on Monday; and whatever punishment anybody wants to mete out to the Senator from South Carolina, he will be here at that time.

Mr. NORRIS. There is no question of punishment. I do not think it is any disrespect to him to go on with the bill. It seems to me that, unless there is something new, the bill might very well be proceeded with.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the motion of the Senator from West Virginia should prevail, and the Senate should put the bill on the calendar, it could not be considered for days after the return of the Senator from South Carolina, when he would have an opportunity to call his subcommittee together and submit to the full committee his report, whatever it may be.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator from Nebraska asked if there was anything new in the hearings. I think it fair to say that there is a great deal of repetition in the hearings. Many witnesses who appeared in the past have repeated, in one form or another, much of the testimony given at preceding hearings, either here or in the House.

There are two principal sections of this bill. One is the section dealing with so-called block booking, and the other is the section dealing with what is called blind selling. Particularly with reference to the last section, I think there is new testimony which has never appeared in previous hearings. I think new testimony has been offered which has made its impress even upon the proponents of the legislation; for, as I understand, those proponents have drafted, and have ready to offer, amendments to the section as it stands in the bill as it was introduced.

Whatever else there may be of new matter, I would not attempt to say at this moment; but there is distinctly in my mind—because it made a profound impression upon me—the story of one of the witnesses as to the impossibility of meeting the terms and conditions of the section which has to do with blind selling; and there is an explanation of the effects of that section, and of the impossibility of conforming to it, which is entirely new.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I have said all I care to say about the matter. I cannot vote for this motion, because I do not believe it is necessary; for when the Senator from South Carolina returns on Monday—as he has advised me he will do—I think he will call a meeting of the subcommittee. If he does not do so, of course, the full committee has authority to take the bill from the subcommittee, or give it any instructions it desires to give it.

I think, therefore, it would be unfair and unfortunate for this motion to prevail.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I have not heard from the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Smith], because I have not taken up the matter with him since he has been away; but, after all, this is a controversy between two members of my own committee and two members of the subcommittee, and I have to try to work with all of them. This is a matter which, so far as I was concerned, is entirely between them.

However, I want to say that when the bill was pending before the committee at the last session of the Congress after having been introduced by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], it remained in the committee for a long period of time without any hearings, or without the suggestion of its being brought before the committee. I myself then went to the Senator from West Virginia and said to him that the bill ought to be set down on the committee's calendar, and the committee ought to be called together to consider it. So the bill was in the Interstate Commerce Committee for a considerable period of time during the last session of Congress when nothing was done about it; and it was only because of the fact that I did not want matters to be pending in the committee for a long period of time without action, and particularly this legislation, that I did what I have just stated. I think the Senator remembers the incident.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President-

Mr. WHEELER. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. NEELY. The Senator from Montana has correctly stated the facts about the matter. The reason for my delay in asking the committee to report the bill to the Senate on the occasion to which he refers lies in the fact that some of the proponents of the measure informed me that negotiations were in progress between the motion-picture industry and those who were seeking to reform it, and they asked me to suspend my activities for a short time in behalf of the success of their undertaking. I was later informed that the negotiations had collapsed. Immediately thereafter I successfully sought to bring the bill to the floor, and it was later passed by the Senate.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say that I did not know anything at all about the negotiations between the different persons, but I did know that a great deal of propaganda was coming in to me from all over the country intimating that I was holding up the bill, when as a matter of fact I was urging that it be taken up in the committee and be reported out, because I voted for the bill every time it was before the committee.

However, I may say that I think it would be a reflection upon the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Smith], and I think it would be a rather unfair reflection upon him to report out the bill at this time, particularly when he is not here to state his side of the case on the floor of the Senate. Therefore, I doubt the advisability of taking up the bill in his absence at this time, and for that reason I cannot support the motion; but I will say to the Senator from West Virginia that the Senator from South Carolina has informed me that he will be back here on Monday. If he does not come back as it has been stated that he will come back on Monday, I will take up the matter and call the full committee together.

Mr. NEELY. On Tuesday?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not want to say on Tuesday, but I will call the full committee at some time during the middle of the week. The Senator suggests in an undertone that I agree to call it together not later than Wednesday. I have not any objection to doing that. I think the bill ought to be reported out by the subcommittee; but I do not think the Senator from South Carolina is altogether to blame, for he is absent because of illness to which his secretary now says his wife is subject. I am just as anxious as is the Senator from West Virginia to have the bill brought out of the committee and get it on the floor of the Senate, because I have supported the measure every time it has been before the Senate, and I have supported it upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I suggest to the Senator from West Virginia that he accept the proposal of the Senator from Montana, which I think is a fair one, and let this matter go over.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from West Virginia will accept the proposal made by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, upon the unconditional assurance of the Senator from Montana that he will convene the full committee not later than next Wednesday, and give me an opportunity to obtain a vote on the discharge of the subcommittee if necessary, or on reporting the bill to the Senate, I gladly suspend my efforts in this matter at once.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator cannot suspend action. He will have to withdraw his motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was about to state that in view of what has taken place, the Chair considers that the Senator from West Virginia has withdrawn his motion to take up for consideration his motion to discharge the committee.

Mr. McNARY. Then the order should be made that the motion is withdrawn.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, upon the assurances which have been given by the Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler] to the effect that action will be taken by the full committee not later than next Wednesday, I withdraw my motion and request that it lie on the table until next Thursday.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I object to any conditional withdrawal of the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator has a right unconditionally to withdraw his motion. He may not attach a condition, as he has sought to do. I suggest that he withdraw his motion.

Mr. BARKLEY. In addition to that, the Senator may renew his motion at any time he can get recognition for that purpose, so there is no need to try to attach conditions to the withdrawal of the motion. The Senator may renew the motion tomorrow if he wishes to do so.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has a right to withdraw his motion and renew it at any time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Absolutely; he may renew it at any time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia has the floor. Has the Senator from West Virginia surrendered the floor?

Mr. NEELY. He has not; but requests a ruling of the Chair on the possibility of withdrawing his motion without prejudice to its renewal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may withdraw his motion without prejudice and will not have to give notice to renew his motion.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, upon the assurance of that ruling I withdraw the pending motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn.

FINANCIAL REHABILITATION OF RAILROADS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1869) to protect interstate commerce from the dangers of unsound financial structures and to establish improved procedures and standards for financial rehabilitation of railroads engaged in interstate commerce, and for other purposes.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered. When the request is granted, I wish to make a statement explaining the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I hope it will not be necessary for me to talk on the pending bill as long as I did on the bill passed yesterday. I wish to give, first, somewhat of the background of the proposed legislation, and the reason why the bill now before the Senate should be enacted.

The Committee on Interstate Commerce, as members of the Senate know, has held hearings, investigating the financial difficulties of the railroads and their finances in general. We held very extensive hearings, and have filed many reports.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, does not the Senator think we should have a quorum?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Johnson of Colorado in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Danaher	King	Pittman
Andrews	Davis	La Follette	Radcliffe
Ashurst	Donahey	Lee	Reed

Connally	Johnson, Colo.	Pepper	Wiley

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I wish to give a little of the background of the proposed legislation. First let me say that the part of the bill which deals with the question of setting up the reorganization court, the portion of the bill which is most controversial, was first recommended by three members of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Then it was recommended by the Committee of Six appointed by the President. That Committee of Six consisted of Mr. Carl Gray, of the Union Pacific Railroad; Mr. M. W. Clement, of the Pennsylvania Railroad; and Mr. E. E. Norris, of the Southern Railway, representing the railroad executives; and three members of the railroad brotherhoods. So three members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, three men representing the railway executives, and three representatives of the railway brotherhoods have approved the proposed legislation.

In addition, when testimony was taken before the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate, Chairman Jones of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation appeared before the committee. Mr. Jones has had vast experience in railroad matters, particularly railroad reorganizations. The Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in answer to a question, stated he was in favor of the proposal; that he thought a court should be set up for the purpose of expediting the handling of railroad reorganizations. I asked him with reference to the bill, and he said:

I feel it would be helpful, and, as I understand the bill from $\mathbf{M}r$. Clay's explanation of it, I favor it.

Likewise, I may say that the general counsel for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation favored the idea of setting up a special court to handle railroad reorganization matters.

When the matter was first brought to my attention, and the suggestion first came to me from members of the Interstate Commerce Commission and others, I was hesitant, and members of my staff were hesitant to favor the setting up of a special court to take care of railroad reorganization matters, but it was urged upon us very forcefully that a great many scandals had occurred in the Federal courts of the United States in connection with such reorganizations. Some of those situations have been brought to the attention of the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. Austin], who is a member of the special committee investigating receiverships, commented upon what had taken place during the course of the investigation conducted by the Committee on Interstate Commerce. Some of the scandals which have occurred in connection with appointment of receivers and trustees by United States district courts in connection with reorganization matters have become notorious.

I may say that I not only consulted the different groups I have named, but some of the Federal judges have said to me personally, as well as to other members of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, that they themselves would like to be relieved of handling railroad reorganizations for the reason that scandals have arisen in some of the courts which tended to bring discredit upon all the Federal courts of the United States

I think lawyers in the Senate, as well as lawyers generally throughout the United States, are very jealous of the reputation of the courts and wish above all that they be maintained above reproach. Many of the things which have taken place which have brought discredit upon the courts have not occurred because the courts were corrupt. In some instances we know the courts have been corrupt, but in most instances the scandalous things which have occurred have not been due to the courts' being corrupt, but because the judges knew nothing whatsoever about reorganization or bankruptcy matters in connection with railroads or equity proceedings in connection with railroads, and frequently the judges have been led astray by clever lawyers representing some of the interests affected.

For the benefit of the Senate I wish to read some portions of Interstate Commerce Commissioner Splawn's testimony before the Committee on Interstate Commerce. He said:

Now, this matter of capitalization is of great interest to the public for all the reasons involved in the remedial legislation which you enacted 19 years ago. I think it is so obvious that it is not necessary to dwell on it.

There is another question that arises, and that is as to the possible earnings of a company, a reasonable estimate of the minimum revenues for the future. That is where the Interstate Commerce Commission can function, I think, most helpfully in connection with these reorganizations, both with respect to this matter of capitalization, where there is some opportunity under the present law for it to function, and also in connection with helping the court and being of most aid to the court, the Commission's judgment on what the future earnings would be being the judgment of a detached body with facilities for gathering the information and with the experience in making the analyses, so that when the company goes into court for reorganization if the court immediately would call upon the Commission for a certification of its finding as to what the probable future earnings would be, the Commission could at once hold a hearing, make its findings, and certify them to the court. The court, in the meantime, would wait, taking care of operating matters by referring them to the respective district courts or to an appropriate district court for a particular property.

I may say in this connection that the Committee of Six, composed of representatives of the railroad executives and railroad brotherhoods, recommended taking all matters relating to railroad reorganization out of the hands of Interstate Commerce Commission and placing them in a special court.

I did not agree with that proposal, because I felt that the Interstate Commerce Commission was in a much better position than the courts would be to find the facts with reference to valuation and with reference to the past earnings and the probable future earnings of the railroads. So we left that portion of the work with the Interstate Commerce Commission, with the provision that when the Interstate Commerce Commission certifies those facts to the court, the court will then simply pass upon questions of law.

At the present time the Interstate Commerce Commission not only passes upon questions of fact with reference to valuation and so forth, but it passes upon intricate questions of law. Commissioner Splawn himself said that although there are some lawyers upon the Commission, their time is so occupied with administrative matters that it is very difficult for them to find time to pass upon these legal questions.

Therefore we decided that instead of continuing the present procedure of having the Commission pass upon both legal matters and factual matters, a division of the two functions should be made. Under present procedure, after the Commission has passed upon both the facts and the law, the question goes to the court. However, the court, under the present procedure cannot cross a "t" or dot an "i." If it disapproves the Commission's ruling it has to send the case back to the Commission. Then the Commission reopens it for further hearings, and thereafter sends it back to the court, and the court again either approves or disapproves. and again, if it does not approve, the case goes back to the Commission. So cases are sent from the Commission to the court and back again and we feel that the present proposal would very much simplify the situation in reference to the whole proceeding.

Commissioner Splawn, when he appeared before the committee, further said:

When this finding of what the probable future earnings might be would come to the court from the Commission, the court would then serve that report on all the parties. The different groups of security holders would have this finding as information, and instead of making plans merely for trading purposes, they would begin to make plans realistically. They would come to the court, then, with this group of problems which are purely judicial.

The Charman. You feel that that is what they should do?

Commissioner Spraws That is what they should do and under Commissioner Splawn. That is what they should do, and under your bill that is what would be accomplished.

Under the present section 77 the court refers to the Commission the matter of getting up the plan. That involves adjusting these priorities.

Take the Western Pacific, for example. There was quite a contest before the Commission as to priority of claims of first-mortgage bonds and second-mortgage bonds. It took a lot of time and it required a great deal of attention by the Commission, and after a long and time-consuming hearing the Commission arrived at a conclusion, and what did the Commission then have to say? After all, that is a matter for the court, which the court will have

After an, that is a matter for the court, which the court will have to decide, and when that proceeding gets into court, it is inevitable that the bondholders, against whom the judgment of the Commission went, will seek to have it adjudicated in the court.

The assistance that this will be to the court is to my mind rather doubtful. The Commission is not made up of experts in bankruptcy law, adjusting priorities, and passing on the contractual relationships of claimants.

I will can frapkly that we have Commissioners who would make

I will say frankly that we have Commissioners who would make excellent judges in my opinion, but they are busy with many administrative matters, and the work of the Commission is that of an administrative body. I could mention some Commissioners who, if they were called upon to pass judgment as judges and do the work of a court, would do it quite creditably; but the Commission is not a court. Its procedure under the law is required by the courts in formal proceedings to be quasi judicial.

But the Commission is making findings

Then he takes up several cases which are pending.

I read further:

Someone will say that out of the nine cases the Commission has certified to the courts, the courts have already confirmed four. But they are little cases.

Take the Reader. Its fixed charges were $44,000. The Commission cut them to $38,000, and the court approved that.

Then there is the Copper Range. There the fixed charges were something over $1,000,000. They were wiped out.

Then there was an electric company, the Chicago, South Shore & South Bend Railroad. I have forgotten what its fixed charges were, but in that case the plan of the Commission has been confirmed. confirmed.

The case of the Louisiana & Northwestern the court sent back, but it is now, I believe, back in the court.

In the case of the Savannah & Atlanta, the fixed charges were something over $8,000,000. The Commission reduced them to $1,700,000. As I recall it, the court has confirmed that plan, and through loans from the R. F. C. that line has come out of reorgani-

But those are small companies. The largest, I think, plans for which have been certified to the courts are the Chicago Great Western and the Chicago & Eastern Illinois, and I am not even certain about the certification of the Chicago Great Western. It is in the process of certification. The record had not been certified.

In the case of the Akron, Canton & Youngstown the plan was certified by the Commission, and a master has approved it. It has not yet been confirmed by the court.

I shall not take the trouble to read all of Commissioner Splawn's testimony.

Reading further from the hearings:

The CHAIRMAN. There has been a great deal of criticism of the courts by reason of these receiverships, even to the extent of claiming that there was, if not corruption, favoritism in appointing these receivers and in allowing the fees that were allowed lawyers. In many instances the courts are in discredit.

We had an investigation a few years ago, by a committee of Congress, of receiverships generally throughout the United States, not rectivally with reference to really throughout the United States, not particularly with reference to railroads, but generally. a tremendous amount of criticism. There was Senator Austrn. I was on that commission, and judge after judge came in and just laid the cards on the table and admitted that it was utterly impossible for him to supervise those receiverships in detail and admitted that the system was wrong.

Senator White. I was not originally a member of that committee, but I was in the latter days of its activities. I want to concur in what Senator Austin has said. I think a good many of the courts would be glad to be spared the burden of a job which they could not effectively supervise. The CHAIRMAN. I myself know of judges in my own State who have said to me very frankly that they did not know anything generally about it and could not drop out and leave it to somebody else, and when they were criticized they said that the procedure was wrong.

Senator Reed. Dr. Splawn, you did not specifically mention it, but certain sums have been paid to certain so-called reorganization committees set up by banks. You were not a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission at the time the Kansas commission protested the allowances made to bankers' reorganization commitprotested the allowances made to bankers reorganization committees in the M. K. T. receivership, but the Interstate Committees in the M. K. T. receivership, but the Interstate Committee Commission, which had final say there, cut that down substantially, holding that the bankers were asking too much. I happened to be chairman of the Kansas commission at that time.

Commissioner Splawn. At that time in that proceeding.

The Charman. There has recently been a case in which I know criticism has been made by Senators of the amount of fees allowed to lawyers and charges made to committees on reorganization, which without going into details seemed to me were upconscionwhich, without going into details, seemed to me were unconscionable.

Senator Truman. Some of those judges who handled receiverships, after their experience and after the plans they had authorized were failures, seemed to do a bigger job the next time in the distribution of fees and expenses than they did the first time. That is particularly true of the St. Paul.

Commissioner Splawn. The Supreme Court, if I am not mistaken, in Continental Illinois National Bank v. The Rock Island in volume 294, page 648, said that probably one of the reasons why Congress passed section 77 was to expedite proceedings and to protect the public against these excessive allowances.

In this Western Pacific case to which I referred, that is reported in volume 230 of I. C. C. Reports: At page 87 there is a short paragraph in which the Commission discusses the public interest. I should like to read that into the record:

"It will be observed that so for use the controllection of a reserved."

"It will be observed that so far as the capitalization of a reorgan-ized company is concerned, section 77 contains no limitations other than that the fixed charges of the company shall be adequately covered by the probable earnings available therefor, and that the plan as a whole shall be compatible with the public interest. The public interest is not defined, but it would seem obvious that to be compatible with the public interest the plan must provide a capital structure for the reorganized company which will give it a reasonable opportunity to function efficiently and continuously as a going concern. This requires that the capitalization shall not exceed a conservative appraisal of the assets to be taken over by the reorganized company, and that the proposed charges, whether fixed or contingent, shall be within its probable earning power."

That, of course, is what you were interested in in this bill—this question of the public interest involved in these reorganizations.

So we have written into this measure the provision that when a railroad comes out of reorganization its future capitalization shall be based upon its expectable future earn-Then we say that the Commission shall take into consideration what the railroad has earned during the past 12 years, 6 years of depression and 6 years of better times. We say that even the expectable earnings are a rebuttable presumption, and that if there is some evidence to show that a railroad may expect greater earnings on account of some peculiar situation which might arise, the Commission shall take that evidence into consideration.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. Caraway in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. KING. In view of the uncertainties attending our economic system, in view of the uncertainty as to the profits and losses of railroads, in view of the fact that railroads have their periods of decline, their good years and their lean years, and in view of the fact that we are setting up a new court and giving it a wide field of discretion, is there any justification for limiting the factors which should be taken into consideration, including the factor of time, in determining the questions connected with reorganization?

Mr. WHEELER. I think almost without exception everyone who appeared before the committee and everyone who has studied the problem agreed that the basis upon which a company should be reorganized is its future expectable earnings. The question is as to how to arrive at those future expectable earnings. We say, of course, that there is only one test, and that is over a period of years.

I will say to the Senator that we first had in the bill a 6-year period. There was some criticism of that period. It was thought to be too short, because it took in only the bad years. We extended it to 12 years; and I think practically everyone felt that over a period of 12 years, taking in 6 bad years and 6 of the most prosperous years, there should not be any difficulty. Even the representative of the insurance companies who testified said that he felt that the future expectable earnings represented a sound basis. The representatives of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and of the Interstate Commerce Commission felt the same way about the matter. I do not know of anyone who came before the committee who dissented with reference to that suggestion.

There were suggestions of some modifications. Some of the witnesses felt that there should not be any standards at all in the bill. However, the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is more familiar with the matter, explained, through Commissioner Splawn, that the Commission ought to have some guide. The Commission suggested some of the provisions which we have included in the bill.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. I have hastily read over the section relative to the make-up of the court. Is it the intention of the Senator that the President shall have the right to appoint only members of the bar?

Mr. WHEELER. That is my understanding. Mr. BROWN. The bill does not so state in the first chapter so far as I can see.

Mr. WHEELER. No bill creating a court has laid down such a requirement. It is not necessary to appoint a lawyer even on the Supreme Court of the United States. Some persons think members of the Supreme Court have been appointed who have not been lawyers. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN. In two or three States-I think New Jersey is one, and I rather think Delaware is another-it is not necessary that members of the court be lawyers.

Mr. WHEELER. It is not required in the Federal courts.

Mr. BROWN. I somewhat disagree with the view expressed by the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee, because it seems to me that in a reorganization of this kind there should be room on such a court for men who have had experience in railroad reorganizations.

Mr. WHEELER. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BROWN. Members of the Interstate Commerce Commission are not required to be members of the bar. I was going to commend the committee on the fact that that requirement is not in the bill.

Mr. WHEELER. It is not in the bill.

Mr. BROWN. I think that in the make-up of the court the President should give consideration to the appointment of men who are experienced in the railroad business, even though they may not be members of the bar.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. KING. I do not quite agree with my distinguished friend. The Commissioners need not be lawyers, and the statement was made that some of them are not lawyers. There are legal questions involved, and for that reason it was deemed best that there should be a court consisting of those trained in the law. Under the provisions of the bill the Interstate Commerce Commission is the fact-finding body. It finds the facts and certifies those facts to the legal authorities.

Mr. BROWN. In the operation of the bill.

Mr. KING. In the operation of the bill. As I understand, the Interstate Commerce Commission is to make the investigation and certify the facts. It will determine whether or not there should be a reorganization, and the character of it, and then certify the facts to the court. After all, the court passes only on the legal questions.

Mr. BROWN. In the determination of the question to which the Senator from Montana just referred-that is. the proper capitalization of a railroad-

Mr. WHEELER. That is all to be done by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BROWN. It seems to me it is finally done by the

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, no. It is done by the Interstate Commerce Commission. As I recall, the Committee of Six in its report recommended that all reorganization matters, not only with respect to capitalization but with respect to other features, should be taken away from the Interstate Commerce Commission and put into the special court. I disagreed with that view, and said I felt that the Commission was much better able to handle the economic situation; and when it handles the economic situation, and says what the capitalization should be, it should then certify its finding to the court. The presumption will be that the company can earn in accordance with the finding of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The courts will take that finding. Of course, that presumption is a rebuttable presumption, as all presumptions are; but ordinarily the court will follow a finding of fact by the Commission, unless some reason is disclosed why it should not do so.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that, as I read the bill, I understand that the court is to perform only legal duties, if I may use that expression. It is to be a judicial body, and to act as a judicial body, and not as a fact-finding body. The Commission, with its broad powers, makes investigation and certification to the court, and the court then determines the legal questions involved.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. It is my understanding that the bill does not, in express terms, require that the appointees to this court shall be lawyers.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. WHITE. Under the terms of the bill it is not necessary that they shall be lawyers, although, I presume, the proposed legislation contemplates that they shall be lawyers.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. WHITE. I have in mind the provision that authorizes the chief justice of the court to assign its members to any district court or any circuit court of appeals. Of course, it is inconceivable, unless they are lawyers, that they should be so assigned

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I vield.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it not true-and I am merely asking for information: I do not know—that a Federal judge, say, a judge of the circuit court of appeals, does not necessarily have to be a lawver?

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct; and a judge of the Supreme Court, for that matter, does not have to be a lawyer.

Mr. NORRIS. No; because the Constitution does not so provide; and this court is provided for in the same way, except that it is created by statute instead of by the Constitution.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I presume there is no requirement even with respect to a Justice of the Supreme Court that he should be a lawyer or even a citizen of the United States; certainly there is no requirement that he should be a lawyer; but, as a matter of fact, if a member of the court proposed to be created by this bill is to be assigned to a district court of the United States, to serve on the district court or to serve as a judge of the circuit court of appeals anywhere, I think we would generally agree that he ought to be a lawyer, and the probabilities are perfectly overwhelming that the President will only consider a lawyer for appointment.

Mr. NORRIS. That is very likely true. At the same time, as our civilization advances from year to year we can see, I think, the importance of having philosophers on the court in preference to lawyers. It is a good thing to have a man who is both a philosopher and a lawyer on a court; but if he cannot be both, I would rather he be a philosopher than a lawyer. It is important frequently that he also be an economist. I am not advocating that men who are not members of the bar be made judges of courts, but I should like to see it done once in a while in the case of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. KING. I think we would have greater difficulty in finding philosophers than we would have in finding lawyers. Mr. NORRIS. It might be a very difficult thing to find philosophers; but when one was found, at least there would be a philosopher on the court and not a lawyer. Lawyers can be picked up on the street anywhere, any place. They are scattered around everywhere.

Mr. WHEELER. It is rather easy to pick up philosophers,

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President-

Mr. WHEELER. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to make an inquiry which it seems to me to be appropriate at this time. As I understand the bill, the Interstate Commerce Commission remains the factfinding body?

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. And is supposed to perform all the duties in connection with the finding of facts in matters under its jurisdiction?

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. And then the case, if an appeal is taken, goes to the court?

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. I presume, of course, that the committee gave a great deal of consideration to the creation of this special court?

Mr. WHEELER. It did.

Mr. BORAH. But, in my opinion, a special court known as a railroad court to deal particularly with railroad matters or matters connected with railroad reorganizations will be unsatisfactory when it comes to be put into operation.

We tried the Commerce Court, but we were not satisfied with it, by any means. To create a court which in the public mind will have to do with railroad matters, a court specifically dedicated to that kind of work, and known to the community, to the public to be such, will result in the concentration of all efforts possible to get onto that court a class of men who see things from that viewpoint, and the public will come to believe that they are considering cases which come before them from that viewpoint. Even if they decide a question correctly the impression will be created that this court is designed particularly to deal with railroad matters, and is looking at questions from that viewpoint and not from the viewpoint of the public. I offer this as a suggestion, having some recollection, as other Senators have, of the Commerce Court. A special court to look after the interests of special business concerns and special phases of industry will never, in my opinion, be satisfactory in the long run. It comes to be regarded as narrowing its views to certain aims and will never possess the respect and confidence which a court should always possess.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I am moved to observe that my impression of the pending bill is that it proposes to amend section 77 in respect to the court in this way because the existing clause 77 of the Bankruptcy Act, under which the Interstate Commerce Commission hears and decides matters of a judicial nature comprehending all aspects of railroad organization, has been found in practice, during only a short period of time and with twenty-seven-odd railroads in reorganization, not to be satisfactory.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. AUSTIN. One of the objectives of this bill is to take from the Interstate Commerce Commission all those functions which normally are exercised by a court of justice and turn them over to a court of justice, leaving as a residue in the Interstate Commerce Commission only the functions of passing upon the limits of the new capitalization of the reorganized corporation and the question whether the plan to be submitted to the court conforms to the standard set up by Congress. Those are the only two things in connection with reorganizations that will be left in the Interstate Commerce Commission as functions. All other functions which are of a judicial character, I understand, are transferred by the proposed act to a court of justice. We might have established a new bureau here at Washington to exercise executory powers, but as the bill is now presented to the Senate we believe this court will be a real court of justice and not a new bureau. It will hear and decide cases, and when it has rendered its decision anybody who has property involved or rights involved can appeal from that court and can go to the Supreme Court of the United States and have a review.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the able Senator's presentation of the matter seems to strengthen the view which I entertain. Here we have a court called a court of justice, and at the same time it is distinguished from all other courts by calling it a railroad court.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say, if the Senator will permit me, that I am sure if the Senator realizes what has been going on in railroad reorganization proceedings in the courts, he will feel that we ought to take such cases out of the hands of the courts.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with that.

Mr. WHEELER. The records of our committee are filled with scandals. One judge in Chicago, for instance, appoints trustees and allows them fees that the Commission thought were unconscionable, but when they notified the court they were told that they should mind their own business. Scandals in reorganization proceedings have reached the point where even many Federal judges have said, "We want to be rid of this class of business because it is bringing discredit on the judiciary of the country."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if we are endeavoring to find some way by which to purify the judiciary, and make it more responsive, we had better consider now the proposition of limiting the time in which Federal judges may serve.

Mr. NORRIS. That is correct.

Mr. WHEELER. I would not have any objection to that. Mr. BORAH. A judge sitting in Chicago under the same circumstances and environment and with the same lifetenure privilege would not likely be any better because he was called a railroad court judge than if he were called a judge of a district court or of the circuit court of appeals of the United States.

Mr. WHEELER. That is right.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, we realize that mistakes are made, but I cannot understand how we will rectify those mistakes by calling a man a railroad judge instead of a Federal judge.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that the reason why we have these mistakes at the present time is not ordinarily because the court is crooked; that is not the reason; but the average Federal judge, if asked about the matter, will say that the difficulty is that the judges do not know anything about these reorganizations; that their time is so taken up with the trial of cases of other kinds that they cannot give and have not given such matters the consideration which they should have. So we are setting up a court which we say shall do nothing else except consider the legal and intricate questions involved in reorganization matters.

One-third of the railroads of the country are either in bankruptcy or in receivership. Another third of them are hanging on by their eyelashes. Something has to be done, and everybody recognizes the fact.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I recognize that something has to be done; but I cannot see that any remedy is effectuated by simply selecting another human being whom we call a judge and giving him the same power, but dedicating him to a specific kind of work, which will concentrate upon the selection of the men who are to fill those places all the possible efforts that can be brought to bear to get a particular class of judges to work upon that kind of cases.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment at that point?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not a fact that the Congress of the United States once before embarked upon such a policy as that in the constitution of the so-called Commerce Court?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And that instead of obviating and doing away with the vicious practices which were complained about, it really led to one of the greatest national scandals that the country ever had, so far as the judiciary is concerned?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. So that the Congress had great difficulty in getting rid of the Commerce Court?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; but let me say to the Senator that there is a vast distinction between the court which is being set up under this bill and the Commerce Court.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should be very much interested to find out about it.

Mr. WHEELER. There is, because the Commerce Court which was previously set up dealt with financial matters and with other matters, whereas this court is going specifically to deal not with economic matters but merely with those provided in the bill.

That is where I think we ought to draw the distinction. This court is going to deal only with the legal matters which involve priority as between this bondholder and that bondholder. So we are going to have a court which is not merely a railroad court, but is one which will deal with the interests of bondholders.

Let me say to the Senator that in the case of some of the railroads there are hundreds and hundreds of different bonds. There is one kind of bonds upon this branch of the road, and another kind of bonds upon another branch of the road, and still another kind of bonds upon another portion of the road. Finally a controversy arises between the different bondholders as to which kind is going to be preferred, and it is a very intricate matter.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, assuming that all of that is true, why would it be impracticable or difficult for any Federal judge with ordinary capacity to pass upon those legal questions, the same as they pass upon all other questions? What is it that makes it necessary to have a man of specific knowledge unless we propose to select out a class of men separate and distinct from the general ability, and have a kind of a court of experts, looking at everything from a certain viewpoint?

Mr. WHEELER. In my judgment, that is what this court should be. As a matter of fact, there are a few courts in the country which have had before them so much work of a particular kind that they have become experts in the particular matters with which they deal; but that is not true of the average Federal judge in this country.

The only persons who came before the committee to object to this bill were the lawyers who had some cases before Federal judges, and were representing some group of executives whose roads were in the hands of receivers, and the lawyers wanted to leave the matters in the hands of those particular judges at that particular time. I do not care to particularize between the different judges; but I do say that some of the men who came before us had their cases before some pet judge, and under this bill they cannot pick out the judge. At present, when they want to have their railroad go into receivership, they pick out the particular judge before whom they want the matter to come.

Mr. BORAH. Every effort in the world will be exercised to select those particular judges before they ever go on the bench.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, that may be true.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, if I may say a word-Mr. WHEELER. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BROWN. As I get the idea of the Senator from Idaho, he is saying substantially that the kind of experts the Senator from Montana speaks about can be found only among those who are now in the employ of the railroads. That is where the experts would have to be secured. They are the men who know about that business.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not agree with that conclusion, because there are in this country some very able experts who are not employed by the railroads. On the contrary, there are experts in reorganization who are almost always on the opposite side from the railroads.

Mr. BROWN. The great majority are on the side of the railroads, however.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President-

Mr. WHEELER. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator from Idaho [Mr. Borah] has put his finger on a weak place, if there is a weak placeand it seems to me there is-in the new court that is being set up. Perhaps the Senator did not intend it in that way, but to my mind in his remarks he has suggested a remedy. and the Senator from Montana has given approval.

In the course of the remarks of the Senator from Idaho he said that the judges of the new court are to be appointed for an unlimited term; that is, appointed for life. Their terms ought to be limited.

Mr. WHEELER. I should have no objection to that.

Mr. NORRIS. How easy it would be to do that. I think that would remedy the whole situation. It seems to me, if my philosophy is right, it would put the court above reproach in that respect, because after we pass the bill human nature is going to be just the same as it is now.

The suggestions made by the Senator from Idaho as to error in the proposed law are going to be well founded unless we change human nature or change the bill. There will be an incentive from time to time to fill the court with railroad lawyers, so that its name will mean what it says—that it will be a railroad court. We can remedy it all, according to the suggestion the Senators themselves have made, if we strike out in line 5, page 2, the words "good behavior" and insert in lieu thereof the words "a term of 9 years."

Mr. TRUMAN. I think the Senator is exactly right about

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President-

Mr. WHEELER. I yield to the Senator from Colorado. Mr. ADAMS. Does not the Constitution require that judicial officers, even of the inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior?

Mr. WHEELER. I think that is true.

Mr. NORRIS. Perhaps it does. Mr. BORAH. That difficulty could be obviated by creating a tribunal, but not creating a Federal court.

Mr. WHEELER. We can make it a legislative body in the nature of a commission, and in that way limit the tenure.

Mr. BORAH. I do not like to have created in our judicial system something which is in the nature of a special commission and call it a court, because it does not fit into our judicial system. During our experience with the Commerce Court we found what happened. The interested parties undertake to treat such a body as a separate and distinct entity from a real court, and they concentrate all their efforts to control it from that standpoint. As a constitutional proposition, if we create a Federal court we have to give life tenure to the judges; but we may create a commission, and I would much rather have it that than to create a court.

Another thing: After this court is created, its members are to be sent out through the country, wherever it is desired to send them.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct. That is, if they are not busy, the Chief Justice may assign them to do duty in some other court.

Mr. BORAH. I only want to impress upon the Senator the necessity of avoiding creating what we call a railroad court. Mr. WHEELER. I do not care what name it is called by.

Mr. BORAH. When I say "a railroad court," I mean a court which not only is called a railroad court but which will be a railroad court, not necessarily in a corrupt sense but by reason of the influence brought upon its members to consider that it must see things from a different view than that of the ordinary court. A narrow, one-sided, biased view. What is the object of creating this court if it is not to give its views and decisions a particular slant.

Mr. WHEELER. I should have to disagree with the Senator, because I assume that when the President of the United States appoints persons on the court, in the first place, he is not going to appoint men who have just been railroad lawyers; and, secondly, anyone who is appointed will have to be confirmed by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President-

Mr. WHEELER. Just a moment.

With reference to the Commerce Court, I call attention to the fact that the Commerce Court took up rate cases and heard them de novo. Nothing of that sort is involved in the legislation with reference to this court. The Commerce Court took up rate cases, economic cases, and everything else. This is a court to decide the disputes between these different

I desire to call attention to what Commissioner Splawn said with reference to this matter. Commissioner Splawn has given a great deal of study to this subject, and was at one time appointed by the Interstate Commerce Committee of the House to make a study of reorganizations of holding companies. He did probably one of the most effective and one of the best and most constructive jobs ever done before he was appointed on the Commission. Since that time he has given a great deal of thought and study to the subject. I may say that Commissioner Splawn and the three Commissioners who were appointed as the President's special committee something over a year ago all suggested a court.

At first, as I said a moment ago, I was not enamored of the idea of a court, but nearly everyone who came before the committee, except the lawyers who practice before some of the courts, particularly some of the courts which have been criticized, agreed that setting up such a court would be advisable. Three railroad presidents who came before the committee-Carl Gray, of the Union Pacific; Mr. Clements, of the Pennsylvania Railroad; and Mr. Norris, of the Southern-endorsed the proposal. The Interstate Commerce Commission and the R. F. C. were also represented.

Under section 77 the directors of a defunct corporation propose a plan, with which they do not believe anyone will be satisfied, but they propose it for trading purposes. Some of the minority groups come in and say, "We do not like this plan, and we will not take it." So a controversy arises, and finally a compromise is reached, and frequently after a railroad has been through reorganization, it has a greater debt burden than when it went into reorganization, and knows that it will have to go into reorganization again in 2 or 3 years.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. Did it not appear in the hearings that during a short period of years new issues of approximately $2,000,000,000 were authorized with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, given without the standards which are laid down in the pending bill?

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. AUSTIN. Which new issues have in this short time been defaulted?

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. How will the railroad court remedy that?

Mr. AUSTIN. The railroad court will enforce the standards set down in the pending bill. The bill lays down the standard of earning power. As it was first drafted, the court would have had to take into account the average annual net operating income for the past 6 years. That was criticized, and I think justly criticized, and therefore there is an amendment pending which will increase the time to 12 years, thus taking in prosperous years as well as the 6 depression years immediately preceding the present.

In addition to that, the court must take into account only that consideration of reproduction costs and other relevant facts, if any, as the Constitution requires; and add to these factors the market value of nonoperating properties, and thereby ascertain the rule of value for capitalizing the new company. That is an extremely severe rule. I confess to the Senator that my own impression is that it is too severe; but how are we to know the effect if we do not try some of these rules? In any event, we can safely predict that this bill will squeeze out of railway corporations the great burden of fixed costs and carrying charges which now they have to carry in the way of interest on an overcapitalization.

Therefore my answer is that the new court, by executing the law we are now trying to enact, will put the railroads on a basis so lean as to their debts, and, therefore, their interest charges, that they certainly ought to be able to continue in the future for a long time without again going into receivership.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, from what the Senator states in regard to the rule and the general principles which have been laid down in the bill, it seems to me it is exceedingly sound, and I am thoroughly in harmony with it. But what Federal court would not enforce such a law? There is here proposed a law in which rules are established, and in which certain propositions are laid down. Finally, the court is asked to enforce the law. Why do we have to have a special court, which is to be called a railroad court, a special set of judges, for the enforcement of those settled principles?

Mr. AUS'IIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. Because under the present arrangement a single district judge has other business to attend to than a court receivership, which consumes an enormous amount of time, and calls for special knowledge, and calls for attention to detail, such as watching the receiver or the trustee in reorganization. Unfortunately, we found judges who admitted that they had neither the capacity nor the time to perform this special kind of work. That is the only saving grace of this proposal, as I see it. I do not like the idea of an additional court any more than does the Senator from

Mr. BORAH. There will be the same want of capacity as inheres in all human transactions, and there will be the same kind of men sitting upon the court. But they will be a court which has been set apart to do special work. The Senator says they must have special knowledge. In other words, as the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Brown] says, we are calling for a set of experts.

Mr. AUSTIN. That is correct. Mr. BORAH. Let us call them experts, then, and not call them a court.

Mr. AUSTIN. They would be exercising judicial functions. Mr. BORAH. I venture the opinion that we would rue the day if we undertook to build into our judicial system a special court for the purpose of dealing with special industries and special enterprises and efforts of that kind. The people would lose confidence in it. They would not regard it as a court, but they would regard it as the agent of such special industries. The railroads would have their court, in the minds of the people of the country.

Mr. WHEELER. I cannot help what the people of the country may have in mind with reference to it. The people frequently entertain mistaken ideas. I am sure the Senator has the wrong idea with reference to the court. there is an effort at reorganization, the fight which then proceeds is between the various equity holders. The Senator may rest assured that when the various equity holders come before the court or before the Commission they are represented by this bondholders' committee or that bondholders' committee or somebody else's bondholders' committee. They are fighting very bitterly. The court will have to pass on controversies between the different litigants, not between railroad companies, but between the different litigants who are interested in the bonds.

I started a moment ago to call attention to what Commissioner Splawn stated. He said:

One of the virtues of your bill is that it sets up a special court. One court of three judges should give all of its time to this litigation.

I may say that when we introduced the bill it contained provision for three judges. I was and still am of the opinion that three judges would be better, but it was contended that there should be five instead of three, and the committee finally adopted a provision for five judges, instead of three. Commissioner Splawn further stated:

Commissioner Splawn further stated:

You have had these receiverships scattered all over the country, wherever they might have happened to occur, throughout all railway history, and what have you got? Nothing in the way of development of a principle. You have today the same groping in the dark, the same blind trading, and the same pressures that have always occurred. Judges are not always experienced in these matters. Of course, we are now getting some district judges who have had a lot of experience. For example, in the Middle West, where this map shows so many railroads are in reorganization, some of those judges have several of those cases on their dockets and have had in years past. But ordinarily one of these cases comes in as a big case that interrupts the court's regular docket. It takes much of the court's time. It is a tremendous chore in addition to the regular grist of legislation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this gentleman fails to state, in my opinion, how the special court is going to remedy conditions. For instance, if there is too much work in the Federal courts now, there is one way to remedy that, that is, by the appointment of more Federal judges. But it is not possible to get a different class of men from the bar of the country by merely calling this a different kind of court. The same class of men would be appointed.

Mr. WHEELER. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. The same class of men would be made judges. I shall not delay the matter very long, but I desire to say that I think it a most serious mistake to set up the precedent in this country of establishing special courts to deal with special business matters.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, whether this court is to be a success or not will depend on the class of men who may be appointed to the court. If poor men are appointed on the court, it will be a failure, if high-class men are appointed it will be a success. It depends entirely, in my judgment, upon the class of individuals who may be appointed on the court.

Mr. BORAH. Let me also call attention to the fact that three judges shall constitute a quorum, "except as otherwise herein provided, and a determination concurred in by a majority of the judges participating shall constitute the determination of the court." So these matters are to be determined really by two judges.

Mr. WHEELER. Two out of three, where there are three. It is exactly the same proceeding we find in the circuit court of appeals today. This provision was taken from the present law pertaining to the circuit court of appeals of the United States.

I do not know that I wish to cover any further points except to say that I think there is general agreement with regard to the proposal in all respects, except with reference to the provision for the establishment of a special court.

I have before me a letter which came to me this morning from one of the independent bondholders' reorganization committees of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, which says:

After a careful study of your railroad reorganization court bill I am writing you to compliment you on this proposal, which to my mind will help to speed up railroad reorganization. The bill is most assuredly a step in the right direction.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Schwarz in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I agree in general that the reorganization work is necessary. If I thought the court was essential to it and in the end would be helpful to it, I would not raise my voice for a moment, because I am perfectly satisfied, as I was when the bill providing for the Commerce Court was passed, that it certainly will not be long before it will be disposed of.

Mr. WHEELER. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that we have a remedy if it does not work out; but the difference between the proposed court and the Commerce Court is that the Commerce Court tried rate cases de novo.

Mr. BORAH. I realize that. They took in greater jurisdiction and undertook to do more things and perhaps did the work a little worse than it would have been done if they had not undertaken to do all they did.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes. It is only for the purpose of trying to correct the different evils which have existed and which now exist in our local courts.

I am particularly anxious and perhaps feel very keenly about the matter, because when the Supreme Court fight was on in the Congress we heard many people say "The courts of the United States are crooked; there is crookedness in connection with receivers, and this thing is bad and the other thing is bad," and people were constantly pointing to something which was considered bad in connection with some local court. I think if Congress were to set up the proposed special court it would relieve the local courts of much of the work of which many of those courts wish to be relieved. Many judges say they cannot handle the railroad receivership work with all the other work they have to do, and if the proposed court is established it will specialize in that particular line of work.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. I wish to refer to a remark which the Senator made about 10 or 15 minutes ago. There is no question that at the present time we lawyers hang our heads in shame at the revelations which have been made concerning some of the highest courts in the United States. The Senator said there was a judge in Chicago who was justly subject to great criticism because of his action in connection with certain railroad receiverships. The Senator realizes that that statement reflects upon somebody in Chicago. I think the Senator should not make that kind of statement unless he specifies who the judge is.

Mr. TRUMAN. I will specify who the judge is if the Senator will permit me to do so.

Mr. BROWN. Such a statement casts reflection on every Federal judge in the city of Chicago. I know to whom the Senator is referring.

Mr. TRUMAN. It is Judge Wilkerson.

If the Senator will read the report, part VII of the investigations with reference to railroad holding companies, which I think is on every Senator's desk, he will find exactly to which judge we are referring.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. There is no doubt that developments with reference to the courts have been such at times as to disceurage those who believe that the courts are indispensable to the preservation of constitutional government. But when we take into consideration the fact that these courts have been running now for 150 years, and the very limited number of judges who have sacrificed their positions and dishonored their calling, I think it is a great credit to the judicial system of this country. Those who have dishonored their great calling have in a sense accentuated the glory of the system, because the number has been rare.

I know the reference which is being had now to this particular judge, and I presume there are other references which will be demonstrated in a conclusive way in a few days as to the conduct of these judges. Such conduct is indefensible and intolerable. But take it as a system and it compares favorably with any judicial system of which we have any knowledge.

knowledge.

Mr. WHEELER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BROWN. I agree with the Senator from Idaho entirely, and I will say that my purpose in rising was to make certain that we did not cast suspicion upon every judge in the city of Chicago. If there is a judge there who has done something that is justly the subject of criticism, I say that he ought to be named, and that we in the Senate of the United States ought not to lend color to the idea that we have suspicion of all judges generally.

I agree with the Senator from Idaho. I think the record has been remarkable. I think the judicial system is one of the very finest things we have arising out of our Constitution. Therefore I do not want suspicion to be lightly and carelessly cast upon a lot of judges when there may be just one or two that are to blame. I think the name of the judge who has been in the Senator's mind should be stated to the Senate and to the people of the United States.

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. TRUMAN. I agree entirely with what the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Michigan have had to say on the subject. The hearings of the subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, which went into detail with respect to receiverships of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul, the Wabash Railroad, the Chicago & Eastern Illinois, and the Chicago & North Western Railway have cast plenty of reflection upon one or two judges who have handled these receiverships, and the result of that hearing is the bill which is before us now by which we hope to correct those very evils, and to preserve for the courts the respect of the public generally and of the country.

Mr. WHEELER. I agree entirely with what the Senator has said. When persons have criticized the courts I have said that I have had occasion to study the judicial systems in some other countries, and with all the faults in our judicial system—and we have some—our judicial system is the best judicial system.

dicial system of any in the world.

After all, these matters have to be judged relatively. Some may say that a better judicial system exists in England, in France, in Germany, or in Russia, or in some other country, but when conditions in other countries are examined one must come to the conclusion that, with all the faults of our judicial system—and some faults exist in it—yet we have the best judicial system in the world.

Mr. President, the only reason I agreed to accept the proposal with reference to the court to deal with railroad reorganizations was because for 2 years instances of abuses in some of the Federal courts in connection with railroad reorganizations have been brought to the attention of our committee to such an extent that I felt that what was occurring was having a tendency to discredit all the courts.

I may say to the Senator from Idaho that some of the judges of the circuit court of appeals and other judges in various parts of the country have stated to me privately that they think the proposed court should be established. There is unanimity in that respect in the Interstate Commerce Commission, the S. E. C., and other public bodies which have to deal with the matter. Jesse Jones, Chairman of the R. F. C., as well as the chief counsel for the R. F. C., had said that we ought to have a special court for the purpose, and it ought to be located in Washington.

Some practicing lawyers have opposed the proposal. I can understand their viewpoint. If I were a practicing lawyer in Chicago and had been handling receivership cases I would not want the court to be located in Washington. I would want to have local receivers; and I would want to have the court in my home town handling the matter of appointing receivers for railroads. That would be looking at it from a selfish standpoint of a practicing lawyer. Some lawyers say a local judge ought to handle the matter. Under the bill the local judge will look after the details, but the court in Washington will act in a supervisory capacity to some extent over the local judge, and particularly, if something goes wrong, it can be called to the attention of the reorganization court.

I may be wrong about it and the Senator from Idaho may be right, but I will say that it was only after the committee had given the matter very serious consideration, after we had listened to many witnesses, that we concluded that the establishment of a reorganization court was the best thing to do. We all recognize that its success will depend entirely upon the men who will make up the membership of the court and upon their capabilities.

I admit that the court can be a complete failure, and it will be a complete failure unless men of the highest type and character, experience, and learning are chosen to sit on it. So far as I am concerned, I shall certainly be very jealous with respect to the sort of men who are appointed to the court, because, having fathered the bill, I do not want to see it result in failure. I wish to see it eradicate some of the evils which have become apparent in various courts in connection with reorganization matters.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. Quite apart from the character of the judges, quite apart from the rightness or wrongness of any particular decisions which may have been rendered in the past, was not one of the prime considerations which moved the Senator and the committee generally to favor the reorganization court proposal the hope that it would expedite the termination of long receivership proceedings?

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I promise not to interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. WHEELER. That is all right.

Mr. BORAH. I know the Senator's views with reference to the courts, and I know the great service which the Senator rendered to this country in coming to the defense of our courts, a service which cannot be overestimated. But I leave this subject very reluctantly. I know that the measure is going to pass, and I do not complain about that. All measures must be disposed of. If I thought the votes could be had, I would seek to strike out the railroad court provision. I want to make it clear for the record that I feel that the creation of special courts to deal with what may be called special matters touching the interests of special industries or special business concerns is contrary to our judicial system. It weakens or undermines the courts generally, and always results in disappointment, sometimes scandal.

So far as selecting capable judges for the proposed court is concerned, I cannot conceive of the appointing power making any greater effort to select competent judges in this instance than in all other instances on the Federal bench. We shall have, as I must repeat, a special court which will concentrate the efforts of all who are interested in directing the views of its membership along certain lines. I do not say this because I am denouncing railroads, but I am opposed to special courts.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me call attention to the fact that in some of the courts we have receivership cases involving railroads which have been pending since 1905, or a period of 34 years. We propose to take those receiverships out of the courts where they have been pending, where receivers have been drawing big salaries and big fees, and to expedite them in the special court. Some of the cases, as I say, have been pending since 1905. Others have been pending in various courts throughout the country from 5 years up to 35 years. There can be no excuse for such a situation. The cases, in many instances, are being dragged along by the dilatory tactics of the attorneys for the receivers and by the receivers themselves.

The proposed court will have special duties. I do not care how long it remains in effect. It may be that if the court does its duty, and expedites these matters, we can abolish the court in a very short time. However, there certainly is a demand at the present time for speeding up railroad reorganizations. For those reasons Commissioner Splawn and the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission think such a court ought to be established.

Let me give an illustration of what is done at the present time in bankruptcy matters.

A bankruptcy case comes before the Commission. The Commission passes upon the facts and the law, and submits the plan to the court. The court looks at it, and, if he does not like it, he sends it back to the Commission. Under the present law he cannot modify the plan. He sends it back to the Commission, and the Commission makes a new plan and sends it to the court. The court cannot cross a "t" or dot an "i." The court may send the new plan back to the Commission. As I pointed out a few moments ago, four out of nine cases have been approved, but they have all been very small cases, in which very little was involved. However, gigantic cases are coming up, with no standards upon which reorganization should be effected. We have no courts who know anything about the matter.

Many of the receiverships are pending before courts which are not interested in them. The time of the courts is taken up. After giving the matter the most earnest consideration, there was not a dissenting vote on the Interstate Commerce Committee with reference to legislation on this particular matter.

I do not care to take up the time of the Senate any longer with a discussion of the bill. I think I have covered its main provisions. I ask that the clerk proceed to state the committee amendments.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I wish to make some observations about the special court.

It seems to me we ought not to let the occasion pass without giving credit to the Federal courts for the good they have done in developing the reorganization method. I say "developing" it because progress has been made in equipping the courts to overcome the oppression exercised by majorities over nonassenting or silent minorities. Notwithstanding the nuisance value which, in the ancient phrase, has squeezed blood money out of those responsible for a sound reorganization because of the ancient rule that no judgment of a court in reorganization could take effect without the assent of all, the courts, nevertheless, have done a great service to the cause of justice in the United States by moving forward, in spite of the lack of statutes passed by the Congress of the United States, and enunciating, by judicial legislation, principles affecting the establishment of plans which are fair and equitable to minorities and which conserve the public interest.

I am sure it is well remembered by Senators here present that we originally had a jurisprudence which provided no equipment for such a judgment; but long before the passage of sections 77 and 77B the courts began to take the situation in hand; and if a plan came to them which was obviously fair, they did not allow minorities to exert the degree of pressure which existed in their nuisance value and then come in and attack the plan. In other words, on the ground that a person who seeks equity must do equity, no objector to a plan was regarded as coming into court with clean hands if the plan was entirely fair to him.

I call attention to what the bench itself has done; and I do so largely to offset any impression that might be created by the debate in the Senate that the Senate is criticizing the entire Federal bench of the United States. It is not doing so. The cases to which I refer as having come to my notice as a member of a special committee were not cases of corruption. They were simply cases in which the judges came right out in open investigations and stated that the situation overwhelmed them. They were not themselves equipped either with time or with special learning to take care of the details of reorganizations. In those investigations the reorganizations were not of railroads, but the same principles obtained. So, the criticism I make generally of the courts is not against the integrity of the courts. The courts themselves recognize the situation.

As far back as 1916 a learned judge, in the case of Guaranty Trust Co. against International Typesetting Co., in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, February 19, 1916, discussed the question. I am quoting from an excellent monograph by Hon. James N. Rosenberg, of the New York City bar, which was reprinted from the Virginia Law Review, Volume 25, No. 2, December 1938. By the way, Mr. Rosenberg is well qualified to write upon this subject. He is the author of Corporate Reorganizations and the Federal Courts, published in 1924. He says that Judge Charles M. Hough made this observation in 1916:

There is a good deal to be said in favor of a new scheme of law which would in some way confer upon an impartial and disinterested tribunal the entire supervision of corporate reorganization.

He was already crystallizing the views held by his fellow judges in the Federal courts.

I read again from this excellent article:

That cause celebre, the then horror of the reorganization bar, the Boyd case, decided so long ago as in 1913, left no future room for doubt that a "sale" to reorganizers was not really a sale but only a "step in reorganization"; that therefore the new company was not freed from old debts if the plan wronged creditors. The Court thereby spread a cloud over old-fashioned reorganizations. But it also went almost out of its way to lift the cloud and render affirmative aid. Properly denouncing "any arrangement by which the subordinate rights and interests of the stockholders are * * * secured at the expense of creditors * * *," the Court at the same time declared that "this conclusion does not * * require the impossible and make it necessary to pay an unsecured creditor cash as a condition of stockholders retaining an interest in the reorganized company. His interest can be preserved by the issuance on equitable terms of income bonds or preferred stock. If he declines a fair offer * * * in a just reorganization * * he could not thereafter attack it."

That was a long step in the direction of section 77, which was enacted in 1934. That decision was followed from time to time by various adjudications of the courts, making progress toward the point of a final holding by the Supreme Court of the United States that the bankruptcy power of the Congress was not limited merely to taking the assets of the debtor, dividing them up, and distributing them among his creditors, but also that the bankruptcy power extended to the permission for a reorganization in which the rights of all claimants, relative as they might be to each other, would be satisfied, not by cash but by a redistribution of the assets of the property.

Section 77B was enacted, but it was found not to be satisfactory, and so soon as 4 years after its enactment the Congress was confronted by a demand from the public that Congress amend section 77; and the principal business before the Senate today is to take out of section 77 the "bugs" that after 4 years of experience have been found to be in it. Among those "bugs" is the lack of expedition; among them is also the strange idea of having superior to the courts of justice a bureau located in Washington called the Interstate Commerce Commission. As the matter has been tried out and experimented with, we find cases shuttling back and forth between the courts and the Interstate Commerce Commission and not coming to a final conclusion and bringing about reorganization. Not only time but money is wasted because of the way section 77 now operates. Therefore a real substantial change is attempted by the bill before the Senate by setting up a court that, it is hoped, will be proficient by virtue of past study and that will gain in proficiency by virtue of special experience in handling reorganization cases, and particularly cases of reorganization of railroads.

It is to be composed of five instead of three judges in order that numerous reorganization cases may be carried forward all at the same time; in other words, expedition in the judicial work is the object. This group of five judges may create a number of different branches of three, staggering the membership in such a way that one judge may be at work in his chambers doing an essential part of his service which can only be done in private, while three of his fellow judges are at work on the bench; in fact, two of them could be in chambers all the time and the work of the court go on continuously, taking care of the cases now pending and those which hereafter may come before them.

The creation of an additional court is not a reflection upon our present judges; it is not a reflection upon the structure of our Federal courts. We frequently create additional courts. An omnibus bill providing many new courts was enacted at the last session of the Congress. To be sure it provided for district courts and one circuit court of appeals, but is there any more reason to object to the erection of another court of the same degree of dignity and power as those courts possess than there was reason to object to the creation of the courts to which I have adverted? The whole matter must turn upon the question of the necessity for the action.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator from Vermont spoke of the expected advantage of expedition from this new court, and he spoke of the possibility of a single judge or two judges being engaged in chambers upon special branches of the work. Is there not a special provision in the bill authorizing the court to assign to a single judge for determination, subject to certain limitations, portions of the work of the court?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, yes, there is, and not only that, but the good that exists is to be preserved by this bill so far as courts go.

There is a provision in the bill that the reorganization court shall assign to a district judge at the place most appropriate for conducting the operations of a railroad in receivership or reorganization that part of the business which relates to the operation of the road. They shall do that; as to that part of the reorganization which is strictly limited to operation the railroad court may impose that duty upon a district court out in the field.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. While the Senator is calling attention to the special courts that have been set up by Congress, it might also be mentioned that we have a United States customs court, located in New York City, the judges of which travel over the country and hear cases within their jurisdiction. We have here in Washington the Court of Claims. Theoretically, the Federal judges throughout the United States could transact that business; theoretically, they could hear and determine questions of customs law and violation of the customs laws. The Federal courts in Washington could pass upon questions of that kind; but we have seen fit, in years gone by, to set up special courts to adjudicate a special type of judicial business Railroad reorganization is a judicial matter. The proposed court might be called by any name desired; it might be called a transportation commission, or anything else; but it will be a court. It has got to be a court, because the matters which will come before it will be judicial. I do not think there is anything particularly virtuous in the name proposed or in any other name that might be given it, because its functions are largely judicial, and must be; and there is no particular vice, it seems to me, in setting up this court to do this particular job.

Mr. AUSTIN. I thank the distinguished leader of the majority for what he has said. I agree with it fully. I might, in this connection, call attention to what the Supreme Court said in its decision relating to the Rock Island case. That was a decision that passed directly upon section 77. I read what purports to be a quotation from that case, taken from the testimony of Mr. Mark R. Bell, who was counsel for the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway, and who ought to know about what he is speaking:

Section 77 advances another step in the direction of liberalizing the law on the subject of bankruptcies. Railway corporations had been definitely excluded from the operation of the law in 1910—

And reference is made there to the statuteprobably because such corporations could not be liquidated in the ordinary way or by a distribution of assets. A railway is a unit; it cannot be divided up and disposed of by piecemeal, like a stock of goods. It must be sold, if sold at all, as a unit and as a going concern. Its activities cannot be halted because its continuous, uninterrupted operation is necessary in the public interest; and, for the preservation of that interest as well as for the protection of the various private interests involved, reorganization was evidently regarded as the most feasible solution whenever the corporation had become "insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature."

So the Supreme Court went on to hold section 77 to be a proper exercise of the bankruptcy power. We are now confronted not with completely overturning that principle, but taking one step further in progress toward an equitable administration of it. We are dealing with administration. This bill does not change the substantive law. Those features of this bill wherein a standard is laid down which must be followed, a channel through which the Interstate Commerce Commission must go in arriving at valuations, do not change the substantive law. They are purely administrative, the Congress saying to an independent body, supposed to be the hand of the Congress, "This you will do in this matter." When we set up the court we are dealing with the judicial aspects of property, of rights, of public welfare, and nobody but a court should have jurisdiction over such matters.

My complaint about section 77 as it is today unamended is that it is not in the hands of a judicial body, but in the hands of an independent bureau in Washington, against which I have no criticism to make when it adheres to those functions for which it was created and to which we now attempt to commit it with respect to reorganization.

What earthly reason can there be to object to adding to our judicial structure another court?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that there could be any objection to adding another court, but I think there is very serious objection to adding a court which has no function or purpose or jurisdiction or power to exercise except in regard to one matter.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, let me say that perhaps the Senator from Idaho does not know that the court has other powers.

Mr. BORAH. I know that it has certain other powers; but, for instance, this court, as a court—not its members, who may be scattered out after a while and sent to this court and that court—this court, as a court, is limited in its jurisdiction.

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; this court, as a bench, has a special jurisdiction; but let me ask the Senator from Idaho, why object to a court having a limited jurisdiction?

Mr. BORAH. If that jurisdiction were determined solely on the question of jurisdiction, it might not be objectionable; but when we limit the jurisdiction to a certain line of business, and dedicate the court to that particular line of work, I think it is open to very serious objection.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does the Senator object to the courts which are already so constituted under our constitutional system?

Mr. BORAH. What courts does the Senator refer to?
Mr. AUSTIN. The Patent Court, the Customs Court.
They are operating entirely satisfactorily to the people of the country.

Mr. WHEELER. The Court of Claims.

Mr. AUSTIN. And the Court of Claims. All of these courts have jurisdiction and power to hear and decide cases, and from them appeals may be taken. That is what we are trying to establish with respect to reorganizations of railways, which constitute a unique type of judicial business. There is no other like it. It is distinguished from all other types of reorganization by the character of the business.

A railroad cannot be divided up into separate parts and distributed among the creditors of the railroad. Why? First, because physically it cannot be done. Secondly, because a railroad is a quasi public property, and the public welfare does not permit the thing to be done.

Mr. BORAH. In my opinion the Court of Claims is a wholly different matter, because that court takes into consideration and within its jurisdiction any claim which arises under the law. It is not confined in its action to a particular line of business or to a particular class of industry.

So far as the Patent Court is concerned, I am not ready to pass upon it as a success.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President-

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. With the Senator's permission, I should like to say before I propound my question that I am not doing it in any fault-finding way. I expect to support the bill. I think the committee has done a great work on it. I think it is a big improvement over present conditions. It may be that the committee has this court in as good shape as it is possible to have it. I admit that my question will be subject to an objection that might be made, that in propounding the question I myself am not proposing a substitute. I confess that I have not any substitute to propose offhand, and perhaps I should not have if I had given the matter as much study as the committee has given it.

In addition to what the Senator from Idaho has said, however, the thing that troubles me about this court is a little different. It probably is going to be difficult for me to make myself understood; but I think the Senator from Vermont will understand my position, and the committee will understand it. Probably the Senate will.

Under this bill we set up a railroad court. The principal object in setting it up—its complete jurisdiction, with some exceptions which the Senator has noticed—is to pass on one particular kind of property; namely, railroad property. The Senator knows, from his experience as a member of the Judiciary Committee, how difficult a task we have when we come to pass on a nomination made by the President for a judicial office. The members of the committee are conscientious; the President has been conscientious in his selection; but with the multitudinous duties that we have, and with the thousands of other duties that the President has, we must rely and he must rely in a majority of cases upon the opinions of other persons as to the qualifications of the particular nominee.

A patent court passes on all patent questions. A district court passes on all judicial subjects that may come within its jurisdiction. The same thing is true of the other courts; but this is a court that has just one jurisdiction.

Will not this be the result: When there is a vacancy on the court, all kinds of pressure probably will be brought to bear from all over the country, from the great corporations which cover the entire country, to have a friendly member of the court appointed and confirmed? With the limited time the President and the Senate have for looking up the qualifications of individuals, the Senator knows that unless we give up other things and unless the President gives up other things, it will be impossible to select a man so broad-minded and so fair that he will not be biased on the one subject of which he is going to have jurisdiction.

I do not know whether or not I have made myself clear;

but the facts I have stated worry me a great deal.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, the Senator's question is a very clear one. In response to it, I desire to say that the assumptions in the question are the same as those which I have already made in the committee. I was greatly disturbed about this court and reluctantly came to the acceptance of the idea.

There was much discussion as to the possibility of the Congress laying down standards or qualifications for the members of the court. Probably I was the only one proposing that course in that particular group. Finally, after much thought, I gave up trying. I sat down with pencil and paper and tried to write out the standards or qualifications, but I could not satisfy myself that I was not writing a very unwise provision. Then, on reflection, is it not true of our judges as a whole that when men are selected and approved by the Senate and go on the bench, the mantle of dignity and sense of justice make those men come out of "the illusions of the den in which they have lived," and do they not on the whole make good judges? And when we have a bench of five-and that is one reason why I wanted five instead of three-do we not at least find diverse views on the bench?

These are considerations only. I am not arguing for or against the thought of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I think what the Senator says is true.

Mr. AUSTIN. The point is that we have to trust somebody in our system. Often we accept a nominee whose name comes to the Senate from the White House, although we are not content with him. Personally, I have accepted and voted for men with whom I was not entirely satisfied, believing that they were honorable men, and that the importance and responsibility of the service they were to perform would be sufficient to hold them straight and keep them judicial. That is all we ask; is it not? All we ask is that we have a fair person, and that he make his decisions as nearly right and just as he can with his natural capacities. That is all we ask.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course; that is all we have a right to ask. That is all any honest man would ask. Some of the railroads of the country, however, probably would want to control this court. Some of them would not. They are composed of men just like ourselves. Knowing what the President has to do in making a nomination, knowing what the Committee on the Judiciary has to do in making its investigation and what the Senate has to do in acting on the nomination, knowing our shortcomings and our limitations, our own experience conclusively shows us that we have to pass on these matters, as the Senator has said, with dissatisfied minds. We are not satisfied. If the railroads should want to control this court, the opportunities for deceiving the President and the Senate would be so multitudinous, so wide, so great, that I am afraid in time we would have a court that would be a railroad ccurt in reality, as well as in name.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MEAD in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. I merely desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question. I can understand his apprehension, and I have great deference for his judgment and his purpose; but I take exception to the thought he has expressed. He suggests, as an illustration of the evil that might follow this action, that the railroads could focus upon the President, and upon the Senate in connection with the confirmation, to get someone they wanted. I do not think that will come about in this country. I offer as exhibit A the Securities and Exchange Commission. It is not a court. It controls the securities issued, and the capitalization of corporations, and is charged, by the intent of the law, at least, to act pro bono publico.

The financial interests of this country have tried, but have not been successful, to enforce their will on the Securities and Exchange Commission. I present the S. E. C. as exhibit A, and a good defense. I cite that to the Senator as an answer to his apprehensions in this matter.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield. Mr. NORRIS. I do not think that is an answer at all. With due respect to the Senator from New Hampshire, we may start out with a court which is perfect, or as nearly perfect as human endeavor can make it, but it is going to last through the years. The very Commission of which the Senator speaks may be completely revolutionized as time goes on. We have done the best we could, and are trying to do the best we can in this case. But the Commission the Senator cites as exhibit A covers a multitude of interests. The Commission proposed in this case covers only one interest, the railroad interest. It is confined to practically one thing, and I do not think the Securities and Exchange Commission is a good analogy.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. KING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. AUSTIN. I think the Senator from Idaho has been on his feet for a long time endeavoring to be recognized.

Mr. BORAH. Assuming we are to select a judge for the railroad court, and the President is called upon to exercise his judgment, and the Senate will be finally called upon to exercise its judgment, and we select a judge or a set of judges for the railroad court, what qualifications, what virtues, what fitness will we consider with reference to the railroad court that we do not consider with reference to every other Federal court?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, my studies have indicated that there are some men who have special knowledge of the subject of reorganization.

Mr. BORAH. Then we will concentrate the efforts of the railroads to get their men with special knowledge of the railroad business on the court, men who run railroad corporations and take care of railroad property. As the Senator from Nebraska has indicated, we may talk about these things. but the Senator knows as a practical fact that these great interests will concentrate every effort to select the class of lawyers who are experts and specialists in that line of business; and their character may be utterly unassailable. Let me say the railroads and their interests would do no different from other interests under these circumstances.

Mr. AUSTIN. I think the Senator is correct in the statement that the Senate should exert its great power to discover the class of men proposed, and of course the Senate should not assent to the appointment of a man of the character described, whatever his skill may be.

I did not quite finish the answer I intended to make. I would not narrow the court to nothing but railroad experts, or experts on finance and reorganization. I should want to see some men on the court who were worthy because of their experience in the law, men who would make good judges and have the judicial attitude. But, really, I think we are not viewing this question in exactly the same light as that in which we have discussed it. A railroad reorganization does not necessarily involve the matter of operation alone. The great issues are not generally the issues relating to operation. The issues which have caused bad decisions, and therefore great loss by the public, have related to finance, to the capitalization of the new company, the reorganized company, the distribution between the different claimants of ownership of the property, of securities of different grade or standard, the relative rights of unsecured and secured creditors, the relative rights of stockholders, and so forth. Those are the things which become all tangled up in the reorganization of a railroad. So it seems to me that railroad reorganization constitutes a special type of work, for which it is eminently proper that we have a special court. But I confess, as I have all along confessed, that the most disturbing possibility lies in the personnel of the court, and this has been so emphasized in the standing committee and in the subcommittee and here on the Senate floor that I hope that out of it will come great consideration in the appointment of men to the offices, if they are created.

I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The point which the Senator has just made covers the ground I intended to suggest, namely, that while I assent to the views expressed by the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Nebraska, I conceive the primary purpose of the court will be to determine controversies between bondholders and stockholders. Its proper concern will be to determining the validity and priority of securities and claims, to differentiate between various classes of securities which have been issued, and to settle controversies between large numbers of bondholders and stockholders. The duties of the court will be rather those which will belong to courts of general jurisdiction, such as is now possessed by the Federal courts.

Mr. AUSTIN. I thank the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not satisfied with the pending bill. I appreciate the fact that in the circumstances perhaps some legislation is necessary.

Personally, I have sometimes thought that a mistake was made a number of years ago when the railroads were not put "through the wringer," to use the common expression. I remember talking many times with a distinguished Senator whose loss we so much deplore, the late Senator from Michigan, Mr. Couzens, who was a man of large business experience, and who knew the railroad situation perhaps as well as any man in the Senate knew it. He, as well as others to whom I shall not refer, took the view that the wisest course was to permit railroads to go "through the wringer"; to foreclose mortgages and bring about, through the reorganization which would follow foreclosure proceedings, a limited number of railroad organizations, including most of the railroads in the United States.

It was obvious that many of the roads were insolvent and should be reorganized. The result has been that they have been continued in most cases under their old management, with all of their infirmities, incurring additional obligations, so that the burdens and debts are far greater now than they were 5 or 10 years ago.

A mistake was made and we are now confronted with a situation which some believe calls for relief. Perhaps the pending bill embodies the best plan. I am fortified in this statement because of my confidence in the able Senator from Vermont [Mr. Austin], who is a great lawyer and an honest and able public servant. He has given consideration to the legal questions involved, perhaps more than the distinguished chairman of the committee has.

If I vote for the bill, it will be largely because the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Austin], who is a lawyer, are supporting the bill.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I do not deserve such generosity, but I thank the Senator from Utah just the same.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont is far more familiar with the details of the bill than am I, because my time was so much taken up with the bill we passed yesterday, and the Senator from Vermont has given his undivided time and attention to the bill now pending.

Mr. President, I ask now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the amendments proposed by the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will proceed to state the amendments of the committee.

The first amendment of the Committee on Interstate Commerce was, under the heading "Railroad Reorganization Court", on page 2, line 2, before the word "associate", to strike out "two" and insert "four"; in line 19, after the word "Court", to strike out "whenever the chief judge of the Reorganization Court certifies that there is undue delay in reasonably expeditious disposition of the business of the court by reason of there being an inadequate number of judges in said court, the Chief Justice of the United States may assign as many circuit judges of the United States as may be specified in such certificate to serve temporarily as additional judges of the Railroad Reorganization Court (hereinafter referred to as additional judges) and may terminate such assignment when the need therefor shall cease. In case of illness or other disability of any judge of the Railroad Reorganization Court, the Chief Justice of the United States may assign any circuit judge of the United States to act in his place, and may terminate such assignment when the need therefor shall cease; and any circuit judge so assigned to act in place of such judge shall, during his assignment, exercise all the powers and perform all the functions of a judge of the Railroad Reorganization Court. Three judges shall constitute a quorum, except as otherwise herein provided, and a determination concurred in by a majority of the judges participating shall constitute the determination of the court. The chief judge may assign any matter in a proceeding to a single judge for final determination. The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading, "Amendments to section 77 of Bankruptcy Act", on page 15, line 23, after the word "court", to strike out the colon and the following provisos:

Provided, That the provisions of subsection (u) and of the last sentence of the third paragraph of subsection (d) and of the second sentence of the fifth paragraph of subsection (e), as hereinafter set forth, shall be effective immediately upon the enactment of this act: Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed to repeal or amend the last sentence of the second paragraph of subsection (d) of section 77 as it existed prior to the enactment of this act, until the opening of the Railroad Reorganization Court.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I move to amend that amendment by inserting in lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by the committee, the following language:

Provided. That with respect to pending cases under said section 77. for the period of 12 months after the enactment of the Railroad Reorganization Act of 1939 (or until the opening of the Railroad Reorganization Court, if that be later) the Commission may approve and certify to the court a plan in accordance with the provisions of said section 77 as they existed prior to the effective date of this amendment.

Mr. President, permit me to say that the language just read is not agreed to by the Senator from Montana, with whom I have been negotiating in respect of the number of months. My proposal really is a counterproposal to his. He proposed 6 months instead of 12. I do not believe that 6 months is a sufficiently long period. Therefore I propose to put 12 in the amendment. I notified the Senator of my proposal, and with great courtesy he said to me, "Of course, I cannot dictate at all about it. You will have to use your own judgment." I am exercising my own judgment, and nothing more. I may be entirely wrong, but that is what I think the period should be.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Vermont will not ask for the insertion of "twelve." I would be perfectly willing to accept "six."

I am willing to accept the other amendments suggested by the Senator from Vermont. I will say that I took the matter up with the chief counsel for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and after considerable discussion with him I suggested 3 months. He said that he felt 6 months would be sufficient time. We finally agreed on 6 months, and he prepared the amendment putting in 6 months. I hope the Senator from Vermont will not insist upon his proposed change to 12 months. I am sure that the 6-month period is ample time for the accomplishment of that which the Senator wants done.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I have made a careful study of the amendment, and I have not proposed it without being quite thoroughly convinced of the need for it. I hope the Senator from Montana will accept the 12-month proposal. I regret to spend the time of the Senator from Montana and other Senators in discussing the matter, but I feel that I must call attention to the situation.

I have obtained from the Interstate Commerce Commission a statement of the status of pending cases. Senators will note that the statement relates entirely to pending cases. Hearings have been completed but no proposed report issued in three cases, the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Co., Erie Railway Co., and St. Louis-San Francisco Rail-

Cases in which hearings have been completed and proposed reports issued, but no final report issued approving plan, are six: Namely, Alabama, Tennessee & Northern Railroad Corporation; Chicago & North Western Railway Co.; Missouri Pacific Railroad Co.; Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul & Pacific Railway Co.; Chicago, Indianapolis & Louisville Railway Co.; Denver & Rio Grande Western Railroad Co.

There are 12 other cases to which the Director of the Bureau of Finance of the Commission refers, as follows:

Upon review of our records I find that whereas the Commission approved a plan of reorganization for the Western Pacific Railroad approved a plan of reorganization for the Western Pacific Railroad Co. the plan has not been certified to the court because of the receipt of petitions for modification. This leaves 11 cases which have been certified, and they are listed below:

Akron, Canton & Youngstown Railway Co.
Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railway Co.
Chicago Great Western Railroad Co.
Chicago South Shore & South Bend Railroad Co.
Copper Range Railroad Co.
Kansas City, Kaw Valley & Western Railroad Co.
Louisiana & North West Railroad Co.
Oregon Pacific & Eastern Railway Co. Oregon Pacific & Eastern Railway Co. Reader Railroad. Savannah & Atlanta Railway. Spokane International Railway Co.

And the Commission advised me with respect to two other cases as follows:

Extensive hearings have been held in proceedings for reorganization of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. and the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Co., but the hearings in these proceedings have not been closed.

Mr. President, the purpose of my amendment is to afford an opportunity for continuation of the work-the judicial work and the work of the Commission-that has proceeded up to this time in these reorganization cases. In many of these cases a great deal of time and money has been expended and great volumes of records created. I examined the record of the reorganization proceedings in the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad the other day. There were seven very large bound volumes. There was a great stack of testimony. In addition there were numerous exhibits. If that case must be completely tried de novo, think of the loss of time and the waste of money involved.

One of the prime purposes of the bill is to speed up final reorganization. By this amendment I want to give opportunity to bring the pending reorganizations before the Interstate Commerce Commission and to obtain certificates for plans of reorganization, so that the reorganizations may go into the reorganization court or into the court which now has jurisdiction, so that the job may be finished. If we make the period of time a year, we shall make it possible for some of the cases to be so handled. If we make the time 6 months, how many of them can possibly get in under the wire? Viewing the situation as a practicing lawyer, it seems to me 12 months is not unreasonably long. It might be regarded as an unreasonably short time in which to accomplish this great work. I want to save the judicial work and the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission which has already been done. We say in the bill that we intend to do so; but in subsequent amendments to which I shall call attention we practically nullify that declaration.

Notice the principle of the bill. I read two sentences on pages 10 and 11:

Upon the opening of the Railroad Reorganization Court any proceeding within its jurisdiction, which may be pending in any other court at that time, and any appeal in any such proceeding which court at that time, and any appeal in any such proceeding which may be pending in any circuit court of appeals, shall be transferred to the Railroad Reorganization Court, in whole or in part and to the extent and at a time to be specified by order of the Railroad Reorganization Court. All previous action taken in such transferred proceeding or appeal shall stand, notwithstanding the transfer, subject to the same control over them by the Railroad Reorganization Court and to the same right of subsequent action as if the transferred proceeding had been originally begun in the Railroad Reorganization Court.

That principle was thought wise. It ought still to be thought wise. By subsequent amendments I think the effect is nullified. The amendments appearing on page 37, in lines 24 and following; page 39, lines 22 and following; page 42, lines 4 to 9; and page 72, line 23, nullify the declaration of principle.

Mr. President, I discontinue my remarks because the very learned Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler] has suggested to me that perhaps he and I can get together on a period of 9 months. I think we can.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield. Mr. TOBEY. I should like to point out that 9 months is generally a very fruitful epoch. [Laughter.]

Mr. AUSTIN. I hope it will be in this case.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont with the modification suggested.

Mr. AUSTIN. I send the amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont modify his amendment in the manner indicated?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; I have changed the word "twelve" to "nine."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the modified amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont to the committee amendment.

The modified amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, in order to coordinate the other provisions of the bill with the amendment just agreed to, I ask unanimous consent to present four amendments together at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to considering the amendments offered at this time? The Chair hears none, and without objection the amendments will be

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 38, line 2, in the committee amendment, after "1939", it is proposed to insert "or as provided in said section 9, prior to the expiration of 9 months following the enactment of said Railroad Reorganization Act of 1939."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 40, line 1, in the committee amendment, after "1939", it is proposed to insert "or as provided in said section 9, prior to the expiration of 9 months following the enactment of said Railroad Reorganization Act of 1939."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 42, line 7, in the Senate text, after "1939", it is proposed to insert "or as provided in said section 9, prior to the expiration of 9 months following the enactment of said Railroad Reorganization Act of 1939."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 72, line 23, in the committee amendment, after "1939", it is proposed to insert "or as provided in said section 9, prior to the expiration of 9 months following the enactment of said Railroad Reorganization Act of 1939."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next committee amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 19, line 21, after the word "petition", to insert "In any receivership in a Federal court, including pending cases, where it has not been determined that the railroad corporation in receivership is either insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature, any interested person may controvert such insolvency or inability within such reasonable time as the court may specify. If the same be controverted, the court shall determine the issue as soon as may be without the intervention of a jury. If the court determines that the corporation is either insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature, or if the court has already so determined, or if the same be not controverted within the time specified by the court, the court shall enter an order continuing the case as a proceeding under this section, but it shall be designated as a receivership", so as to read:

SEC. 77. Reorganization of railroads engaged in interstate commerce: (a) Any railroad corporation may file a petition stating that it is insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature and that it desires to effect a plan of reorganization. The petition shall be filed with the Railroad Reorganization Court and a copy of the petition shall at the same time be filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission (hereinafter called the "Commission"). The petition shall be accompanied by payment to the clerk of a filing fee of $100, which shall be in addition to the fees required to be collected by the clerk under other sections of this act. Upon the filing of such a petition, the Railroad Reorganization Court shall enter an order either approving it as properly filed under this section, if satisfied that such petition complies with this section and has been filed in good faith, or dismissing it, if not so satisfied. If the petition is so approved, the court shall have exclusive jurisdiction of the debtor and its property wherever located, and shall have and may exercise in addition to the powers conferred by this section all the powers, not inconsistent with this section, which a Federal court would have had if it had appointed a receiver in equity of the property of the debtor for any purpose. Process of the court shall extend to and be valid when served in any judicial district. The Supreme Court of the United States shall promulgate rules relating to the service of process and any other rules which it may deem advisable. Any railroad corporation the majority of the capital stock of which having power to vote for the election of directors is owned, either directly or indirectly through an intervening medium by any railroad corporation filing a petition as a debtor may file, with the Railroad Reorganization Court and in the same proceeding, a petition, a copy of which shall also be filed at the same time with the Commission, stating that it is insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature, and that it desires to effect a reorganization in conas they mature, and that it desires to effect a reorganization in connection with, or as a part of the plan of reorganization of such other debtor; and upon the filing of such petition, the court shall enter an order either approving it as properly filed under this section, if satisfied that such petition complies with this section and has been filed in good faith, or dismissing it if not so satisfied, and thereupon such court, if it approves such petition, shall have the same jurisdiction with respect to such debtor, its property and its creditors and stockholders, as the court has with respect to such other debtor. If such answer shall deny any material allegation of the petition the court shall summarily determine the issues presented by the pleadings without the intervention of a jury and if it shall find that the material allegations are sustained by the proofs and that the petition complies with this section and has been filed in good faith, the court shall enter an order approving the petition; otherwise it shall dismiss the petition. If any such petition shall be so approved, the proceedings thereon shall continue with like effect as if the railroad corporation had itself filed a petition under this section. In case any petition shall be dismissed, neither the petition nor the answer of a debtor shall constitute an act of bankruptcy or an admission of a debtor shall constitute an act of bankruptcy or an admission of insolvency or of inability to meet maturing obligations or be admissible in evidence, without the debtor's consent, in any proceedings then or thereafter pending or commenced under this or any other act in any State or Federal court. If, in any case in which the issues have not already been tried under the provisions of this subdivision, any of the creditors shall, prior to the hearing provided for in paragraph (1) of subsection (c) of this section, appear and controvert the facts alleged in the petition, the court shall determine, as soon as may be, the issue presented by the pleadings, without the intervention of a jury, and, unless the material allegations of the petition are sustained by the proofs, shall dismiss the petition. The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 23, after the word "debtor", to insert "or by the receiver or receivers of a railroad corporation in receivership"; on page 23, line 3, after the word "debtor", to insert "or such corporation"; and in line 12, after the word "debtor", to insert a comma and "or the railroad corporation in receivership", so as to

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, line 20, after the word "character", to insert "and interest accrued and unpaid

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, it seems to me that in the consideration of a measure of such tremendous importance, changing the basic law with regard to receiverships of railroads, we ought to have some explanation of the various amendments. The very able chairman of the committee is in the Chamber. Some of the amendments may [be entirely justified and some may not be. It seems to me the Senate is in the position of permitting a tremendously basic and important measure to be passed without any explanation of any of the changes in existing law or the changes in the bill heretofore proposed by the committee.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, if the Senator had been in the Chamber, he would have understood, because I was on my feet for several hours explaining the bill. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. Austin] then took it up and spoke for about an hour and a half explaining it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will say to the Senator from Montana that I was in the Chamber and heard some of the explanations of the Senator. I tried to ask some questions, but the Senator refused to yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I refused to yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator from Montana refused to yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I certainly beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator was discussing in very large terms the views of Dr. Splawn, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and when he came to the question of the very important matters concerned in the bill, I asked the Senator to yield, and the Senator declined to yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not say

I refused to yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator certainly declined to vield.

Mr. WHEELER. I beg the Senator's pardon, and apologize to him, because I did not hear him. If the Senator wanted to ask a question and I did not yield, it was only because of the fact that I did not hear him.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think these matters should be taken up item by item, because they are matters of the very greatest importance.

Mr. WHEELER. I will say to the Senator that the amendments now in the bill were worked out after full committee hearings, and after considering the suggestions of many witnesses, in an effort to make the bill more workable and helpful. The amendments were to a large extent worked out by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Austin]. At that time he looked after the details because I was busy with another committee. I should be very glad to have the Senator from Vermont explain any of the amendments.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will say to the Senator from Montana that I have certain fundamental objections to the bill. Those objections do not go to the particular amendment which has just been agreed to. However, I feel that in a matter of this importance there ought to be specific explanation of the various amendments. If I have been absent from the floor while the Senator from Vermont was explaining the amendments, I withdraw my objections. However, I do have certain fundamental objections to the bill, which is what the Senator from Montana was discussing, and to which I desire to address myself. I was called away from the Chamber.

Mr. WHEELER. I am sorry if I neglected to yield to the Senator when he asked me to yield. However, I did not hear him. Otherwise I certainly should have yielded. I have never refused to yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will say to the Senator from Montana that there will never be any question of courtesy or friendship between him and me, because I regard him as one of the very ablest Members of the Senate and one of the closest friends I ever had. I have very great respect for the Senator from Montana and for the Senator from Vermont. I happen to have certain fundamental objections to the bill. I did ask the Senator from Montana to yield to me. Possibly he did not hear me.

Mr. WHEELER. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry not related to this particular amendment. On page 12, in reference to practice and procedure, it seems to be provided that the Railroad Reorganization Court, by its own rules, may vary without any limitation the practice and procedure of the courts. The language is:

Except as may be otherwise provided herein or by rule of the court, the practice and procedure in the court shall conform as nearly as may be to that in comparable proceedings in a district court of the United States.

The Supreme Court of the United States, of course, years ago laid down the equity rules and recently the rules at law. This seems to give to the railroad reorganization court the right to make any rules it sees fit which are not in conflict with the provisions of this proposed statute.

Mr. WHEELER. No.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, the bill itself vests in the Supreme Court of the United States the judicial business of making the rules for this court just as for the equity courts and the district courts of the United States. Subject to that, this court, of course, may, beyond the stated rules, make rules relating to its functions, such rules as are commonly made by district courts and circuit courts of appeals and equity courts.

Mr. ADAMS. Then there are other qualifications in the bill besides the ones to which reference has been made?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes. Mr. ADAMS. This section standing by itself would sustain the criticism I have offered.

Mr. WHEELER. The provision concerning which the Senator from Colorado was asking is on page 17, and reads:

The Supreme Court of the United States shall promulgate rules relating to the service of process and any other rules which it may deem advisable.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, out of order I send forward an amendment which I intend to propose, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be stated from the desk.

Mr. WHEELER. Would the Senator mind waiting until we have concluded the committee amendments?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to have the amendment now read from the desk for the information of Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will state the proposed amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 11, after the word "circuit", it is proposed to insert a colon and the following provisos:

Provided, however, That no judge appointed and qualified under this act shall remain on such court or continue to draw salary as a member of such court after he shall have reached the age of 70: and provided further, That any judge of such court who shall serve 10 years upon such court and reach the age of 70 shall be permitted, upon notice as now provided by law, to retire with the pay and allowances of Federal judges of equal rank.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I give notice that at the proper time I shall offer that as an amendment to the pending bill.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, in the discussion of this question of judges, my attention has been directed to the provision on page 2 relating to the appointment of the judges and the jurisdiction that is given them. I have not made such a study of the bill as I should like to have made, but, as I read that provision, it occurs to me that we are creating a group of what at one time around the Senate were called "roving judges."

Mr. WHEELER. No.

Mr. HATCH. Am I wrong about that? If so, I should like to have it explained.

Mr. WHEELER. These judges are not to be "roving judges" in any sense of the word. They, like all district judges and circuit court of appeals judges, can be sent by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court to sit in some particular case when they are not busy with the work of their particular court. I think, however, their time will be fully occupied. The Chief Justice is given the same power that is given him with reference to district judges and circuit court of appeals judges at the present time.

Mr. HATCH. I may be wrong. I desire to know if the Chief Justice can send any of these judges to act either as circuit or district judges into any district or into any circuit in the United States?

Mr. WHEELER. He can do that at the present time with any district judge or any judge of the circuit court of appeals.

Mr. HATCH. Is the Senator certain of that? I am not | certain of it by any means. I am not certain at all that the Chief Justice of the United States can send any district judge into any district in the United States. On the contrary, I think he cannot.

Mr. WHEELER. I will not be certain about it, but I am of the opinion that that is the case at the present time; that is my understanding. I know that district judges have been sent from Montana to New Jersey to try cases and they have been sent from Montana to California and to Colorado and Arizona. A Federal judge in my State about a year ago served for a long period of time in Arizona.

Mr. HATCH. I think, of course, what the Senator says is true, that district judges go all over the United States, but it is only a voluntary matter.

Mr. WHEELER. I will state the reason why this provision is in the bill. Suppose, for instance, there was a time when the judges of this proposed court were not busy; in that event we thought the Chief Justice of the United States. if he wanted to, should be able to assign them to other courts. I have no particular opinion one way or the other about it, but we thought we were following the present law.

Mr. HATCH. I merely wanted to call the attention of the Senate to that provision and to what will be done by the bill, because I quite well recall the discussion that took place here not many months ago about "roving judges" and all that sort of thing.

Mr. WHEELER. That is right, and I still object to "roving judges."

Mr. HATCH. I fear we are creating them by the provision in the bill.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think we are creating "roving judges" when we provide for the judges of this new court.

CONSTRUCTION WORK FOR COAST GUARD

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Schwartz in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1369) to authorize necessary facilities for the Coast Guard in the interest of national defense and the performance of its maritime police functions, which was, on page 2, line 4, after "miles", to insert:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, authorize the construction of the public works and the provision of the public utilities required for the establishment of said Coast Guard base and air station on the coast of Alaska to be accomplished by the Secretary of the Navy under a provision to be incorporated in such contract as the Secretary of the Navy nay negotiate for naval aviation facilities in Alaska under the authority contained in the act approved April 25, 1939, entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with the construction of certain public works, and for other purposes" and the Secretary of the Navy, upon request and a transfer of the necessary funds, is authorized to accomplish said work secondingly.

Mr. BAILEY. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1569) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That paragraph (1) of subsection (e) of section 344 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended (relating to minimum county allotments of acreage), is amended by striking out "For 1938 and 1939" and inserting in lieu thereof "For 1938, 1939, and one subsection trees".

out "For 1938 and 1939" and inserting in lieu thereof "For 1938, 1939, and any subsequent year".

SEC. 2. Subsection (g) of section 344 of such act, as amended (relating to the 4 percent allotment to farms), is amended by striking out "For each of the years 1938 and 1939" and inserting in lieu thereof "For 1938, 1939, and each subsequent year".

SEC. 3. Subsection (h) of section 344 of such act, as amended (relating to providing an acreage to farms of not less than 50 per centum of 1937 planted acreage plus diverted acreage), is amended by striking out "for each of the years 1938 and 1939" and inserting in lieu thereof "for 1938, 1939, and each subsequent and inserting in lieu thereof "for 1938, 1939, and each subsequent vear".

Mr. HATCH. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. HATCH, Mr. BANKHEAD, and Mr. CAPPER conferees on the part of the Senate.

FINANCIAL REHABILITATION OF RAILROADS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1869) to protect interstate commerce from the dangers of unsound financial structures and to establish improved procedures and standards for financial rehabilitation of railroads engaged in interstate commerce, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment reported by the Committee on Interstate Com-

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 25, after the word "trustees", to insert "and receivers"; on page 27, line 21, after the word "trustees", to insert "receiver or receivers"; on page 28, line 7, after the word "debtor", to insert "or the railroad corporation in receivership"; and in line 8, after the word "trustee", to insert "in a proceeding instituted under this section", so as to read:

(2) The court shall fix the amount of the bond of every trustee or receiver and may thereafter terminate any such appointments in its discretion, in any case pending before it or transferred to it, and may in that event and in the event of a vacancy from any other cause, in the manner and within the qualifications herein provided for the appointment of trustees and receivers, appoint a provided for the appointment of trustees and receivers, appoint a substitute trustee or trustees, or receiver or receivers, and in the same manner and within the same qualifications may appoint an additional trustee or receiver, and shall fix the amount of the bond of every such substitute or additional trustee or trustees, receiver or receivers. The court shall in its discretion confirm the appointment of such eligible legal counsel for the trustees or receivers as ment of such eligible legal counsel for the trustees or receivers as they shall select, with power of removal in its discretion in any case pending before it or transferred to it. The trustee or trustees, or in a receivership in any Federal court, the receiver or receivers, their officers, counsel, and employees shall receive only such reasonable compensation from the estate of the debtor, or of the railroad corporation in receivership, as the court may from time to time allow but only for services found to be in the interest of the estate as a whole, and not in the interest of any particular class or classes of creditors or stockholders or member or group thereof: Provided. That the foregoing provisions of this sentence shall not Provided, That the foregoing provisions of this sentence shall not apply to any person included within the term "employees" as that term is defined in the Railway Labor Act, as amended, or as it may be amended. The trustee or trustees, receiver or receivers, so appointed, upon filing such bond, shall have all the title and shall exercise, subject to the control of the court and consistently with the provisions of this section, all of the powers of a trustee appointed pursuant to section 44 of this act or any other section of pointed pursuant to section 44 of this act or any other section of this act, and, to the extent not inconsistent with this section, if authorized by the court, the powers of a receiver in an equity proceeding, and, subject to the control of the court, and the jurisdiction of the Commission as provided by the Interstate Commerce Act as now or hereafter amended, the power to operate the business of the debtor or the railroad corporation in receivership. Prior to the appointment of a trustee, in a proceeding instituted under this section, the debtor on behalf of the court shall continue in the possession of the property and shall operate the business thereof during such period, and shall have all the title to the property and shall exercise all power consistent with the provisions of this secshall exercise all power consistent with the provisions of this section, subject at all times to the control of the court, and to such limitations, restrictions, terms, and conditions as it may from time to time impose and prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 23, after the word "trustees", to insert "or the receiver or receivers", as to read:

(3) The court may, upon not less than 15 days' notice published in such manner and in such newspapers as the court may in its discretion determine, which notice so determined shall be suffi-cient, for cause shown, and with the approval of the Commission, in accordance with section 20a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as now or hereafter amended, authorize the trustee or trustees, or the receiver or receivers, to issue certificates for cash, property, or other consideration approved by the court for such lawful purposes and upon such terms and conditions and with such security and such priority in payments over existing obligations, secured or unsecured, or receivership charges, as might in an equity receivership be lawful.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 31, line 2, before the word "estate", to strike out "debtor's", and in the same line, after the word "estate", to insert "of the debtor or the railroad corporation in receivership", so as to read:

(5) It shall be the duty of anyone having information as to the names and addresses of the holders of any securities of the debtor or the railroad corporation in receivership to divulge such information to the trustee or trustees, or the receiver or receivers, upon written request therefor and, upon petition by any person in interest, and after hearing, the court may order the production of any such information by anyone having and refusing to divulge it to any trustee or receiver, upon written request therefor. The court may direct that the cost of preparing such information shall be borne by the estate of the debtor or the railroad corporation in receivership.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 31, line 4, after the word "debtor", to insert "or a railroad corporation in receivership", so as to read:

(6) If a lease to the debtor or a railroad corporation in receiver-ship of a line of railroad is rejected, and if the lessee, with the approval of the court, shall elect no longer to operate the leased approval of the court, shall elect no longer to operate the leased line, it shall be the duty of the lessor at the end of a period to be fixed by the court, but which period may be extended by the court, if in its opinion there is good cause for such extension, to begin the operation of such line, unless the Commission, on its own motion or on motion of any interested person, shall find after due notice and hearing that it would be impracticable and contrary to the public interest for the lessor to operate the said line, in which event it shall be the duty of the lessee to continue operation on or for the account of the lessor unless and until the abandonment of such line is authorized by the Commission in accordance with the provisions of section 1 of the Interstate Commerce Act as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 36, line 11, after the word "debtor", to insert "or the railroad corporation in receivership"; and in line 15, after the word "debtor", to insert "or such corporation", so as to read:

(13) The court may on its own motion refer any matters for consideration and report, either generally or upon specified issues, to one of several special masters whom it shall appoint and may allow such master a reasonable compensation for his services and actual and reasonable expenses. The debtor, or the railroad coractual and reasonable expenses. The debtor, or the rallroad corporation in receivership, any creditor or stockholder, or the duly authorized committee, attorney, or agent of either, or the trustee or trustees of any mortgage, deed of trust, or indenture pursuant to which securities of the debtor or such corporation are outstanding, shall have the right to be heard on all questions arising in the proceedings, and, upon petition therefor and cause shown, any such person or any other interested person may be permitted to intervene. The court may, after hearing, make reasonable rules defining the matters upon which notice shall be given to other than interveners and the manner of giving such notice. Interdefining the matters upon which notice shall be given to other than interveners and the manner of giving such notice. Intervention shall be liberally allowed in proceedings under this section and in receiverships in Federal courts. Without limiting the generality of the foregoing, the Commission, the judges, and the court shall permit the representatives of employees of the debtor or of the railroad corporation in receivership, duly designated as such for the purpose of collective bargaining as to wages, hours, and other conditions of employment, to intervene and to be heard on all matters affecting the interests of the employees.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 37, line 8, after "(a)", to insert "or after the entry of an order continuing a re-ceivership under this section"; in line 12, before the word "or" where it occurs the first time, to insert "the receiver or receivers"; in line 16, after the word "class", to insert "or by the debtor or the railroad corporation in receivership"; in line 19, after the word "time" and the period, to insert "Any plan heretofore filed in a receivership shall forthwith be filed with the Commission", so as to read:

(d) After a petition is filed as provided in subsection (a) or after the entry of an order continuing a receivership under this section, a plan of reorganization may be filed with the court, at any time within such reasonable limits as the court may by order fix or extend, by the trustee or trustees, the receiver or receivers, or by or on behalf of the creditors being not less than 10 percent in appoint of save class of creditors or by or on behalf of save class of or on behalf of the creditors being not less than 10 percent in amount of any class of creditors, or by or on behalf of any class of stockholders being not less than 10 percent in amount of any such class, or by the debtor or the railroad corporation in receivership or with the consent of the court by any person in interest. Such plan shall also be filed with the Commission at the same time. Any plan heretofore filed in a receivership shall forthwith be filed with the Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment was amended earlier in the day on the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Austin], and the clerk will state the amendment as amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 37, line 22, after the word "filed", it is proposed to strike out the comma and "in any proceeding under this section or in a receivership in any Federal court" and to insert "(except in pending cases where the Commission has approved and certified a plan to the court prior to the effective date of the amendment made by section 9 of the Railroad Reorganization Act of 1939 or as provided in said section 9, prior to the expiration of 9 months following the enactment of said Railroad Reorganization Act of 1939, in accordance with the provisions of subsection (d) of section 77 as they existed prior to such amendment, unless the court refers the plan back to the Commission or unless the court so requests)."

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say that amendment is to make the bill conform to another amendment which was adopted in another place on motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Austin] a short time ago.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me say to the Senator from Montana I have no desire whatever to be captious or to delay the proceedings on the bill, although I am opposed to it; but I think that on a matter of such great importance, proposing to set up a court and to provide the jurisdiction of that court. representing a very important departure from our previous practice, except in the one case of the Commerce Court

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator is wrong about that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me finish. I do not think that a matter of so great importance ought to be considered with less than a dozen Senators present on the floor.

Mr. WHEELER. We called a quorum not long ago, and I cannot help it if Senators do not remain on the floor. I wish to say to the Senator that he was not present this morning when the whole question the Senator has just spoken of was covered.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me say to the Senator from Montana that I have been on the floor all day with the exception of just a few minutes when he was reading a long report from Dr. Splawn, of the Interstate Commerce Commission. If the Senator thinks that he can compel the Senate to act on a measure of transcendent national importance such as this on Friday afternoon at this hour of the evening, 10 minutes after 4 o'clock, with less than a dozen Senators on the floor, I am going to take issue with him.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator there is no disposition on my part to do that. If there is anything the Senator wants to know about this bill, and I can answer it, I will be only too happy to do so. As I tried to explain a moment ago, the amendment which was stated was to make the bill conform to an amendment adopted a short time ago which had been offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. It is to make the provision effective throughout the other parts of the bill; it is a clarification so that this provision will conform to the other provisions of the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Since the Senator from Montana has seen fit to refer twice to the fact that I happened to be off the floor for half an hour meeting some of my constituents, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WHEELER. I have no objection, but I wish to say to the Senator that I did not intend to say anything about him. What I meant to say was that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Austin], in a colloquy with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. Borah], went into the question this morning with reference to the different courts that have been set up by special legislation. The Senator from Missouri may have been on the floor but I just did not happen to see him; that is all; my attention was probably diverted elsewhere. I have not been on the floor during the entire morning; I have been off the floor at times. We all leave the floor at times, for we cannot stay on the floor continuously.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, I certainly have no desire to have any controversy with the Senator from Montana about that matter; but it seems to me this bill is of such transcendent importance that we cught not to pass it with less than a dozen Senators on

I have no desire to filibuster or to delay matters. I myself have been off the floor a part of the afternoon. There is no question about that. Other Senators are necessarily off the floor. This bill sets up an entirely new court, and I dare say that very few Members of this body know anything about the

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, has the Senator withdrawn the suggestion?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I withdraw the suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I feel compelled again to state to the Senate what the provision on page 2 does as to these particular judges.

I think without question it is true that this bill creates not judges for this special court but possible district judges for every district in the United States and possible circuit judges for every circuit in the United States.

It is said that the bill merely follows existing law. I cannot agree to that statement. I think it is true that no district judge may be taken out of his district and sent into another district, even within his own circuit, without his

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator vield?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator will recall that the ill-fated and ill-omened Commerce Court, which was created by Congress a number of years ago in a perfectly honest effort to work out a situation, just as I admit that this bill is a perfectly honest effort to work out a situation, fell into such hands that it amounted to a national scandal. One judge of that court-Judge Archbald-was impeached, convicted, and removed from office: and, as to the rest of the court, it was the almost unanimous opinion that the court should be abolished. But having created that court, and having created the members of it as Federal judges, when the Congress abolished the court it was necessary to find means for distributing the judges of that repudiated and disgraced court around over the country as circuit judges in various circuits.

I think Congress ought to be very careful about running the risk of a repetition of that experience.

Mr. HATCH. That is exactly what I am trying to point

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. With reference to the Commerce Court, I desire to say that on that court were some judges who were just as high-class judges as we had anywhere in the United States, or ever have had. On that court was Justice Hunt, formerly from Montana. He was then on the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit. Anybody who knows anything about him will say to us or to anybody that no more high-minded or brilliant judge ever served on the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator let me interrupt him right at that point?

Mr. HATCH. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I intended no reflection whatever upon any members of the Commerce Court, with the exception of Judge Archbald. Nevertheless, they were members of a repudiated and disgraced and repealed court. We had those judges on our hands; and the Congress of the United States had great difficulty in finding a way to dispose of those judges, other than Judge Archbald, after the court was abolished.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course; but I am assuming and we must assume, with reference to this court, the same thing that we assume with reference to the Court of Claims. We set up the Court of Claims as a special court to handle certain definite types of litigation. We have set up other special courts, including the customs court, to handle certain definite types of litigation. This court is no different in that respect. The difference between this court and the Commerce Court is that the Commerce Court tried rate cases de novo; and it was because the jurisdiction which was conferred upon that court to a large extent made it impossible for it to operate successfully that it broke down.

Let me say to the Senator from Missouri that when this proposition was first suggested to me it was proposed, and the Committee of Six recommended, that we take the jurisdiction entirely away from the Interstate Commerce Commission, and set up a court that would not only handle matters of law but would likewise handle factual matters. I refused to follow those recommendations. I said that the factual matters should be determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that the court as a court should pass only upon the legal matters; and that is all that this court does. It is to pass upon the legal matters, whereas the Commerce Court was passing not only upon the legal phases but upon the economic phases; and the members of that court were not in a position and did not have the experience and could not have the opportunity to ascertain the facts as well as that could be done by a fact-finding commission like the Interstate Commerce Commission.

That is the vast distinction between this court and the Commerce Court; and when it is said that we have not any other court of this kind, I remind Senators that we have these independent courts.

If Senators feel that they would like to cut out that provision, candidly I have no objection whatever. I am perfectly willing; but I thought that by permitting the Supreme Court to assign these judges to work in other districts we were facilitating matters, because the Senator knows from his study that at the present time there are places where it is claimed that there are not sufficient judges, and at certain times they need extra help. However, that is an entirely immaterial matter so far as I am concerned.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that I have not said that this might not be a good provision. It might be a splendid thing.

Mr. WHEELER. We thought it was.

Mr. HATCH. But in view of what I know the attitude of the Senate has been and the attitude of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate has been, I thought the Senate ought to know that they are conferring jurisdiction upon a set of judges who may be sent by the Chief Justice of the United States into any district of the United States to sit as district judges, and may be sent into any circuit of the United States to sit as circuit judges.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes. Quite frankly, I was in favor of a three-judge court. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. Austin] and many persons who appeared before the committee wanted a five-judge court. I said, "I am not particular whether it is a five-judge court or a three-judge court," but I thought three men could do the work. Able lawyers who had had experience in these matters said it ought to be a five-judge court, because they are going to be so busy that it is going to take: five men to do the work. It is a tremendous job. Consequently, I said, "Let it be a court of five men." Then we put in the provision which the Senator suggests, and we really thought it was a good provision. However, I do not care anything about it. If the Senator from New Mexico or other Senators feel that it ought to come out, it is not material to the legislation in any respect.

Mr. HATCH. I recall quite well that in our own committee-and the Senator from Vermont also will recall it, because we had the matter up several times-it was even suggested that we ought to have within a circuit some judge who could be moved about by the senior circuit judge within the districts of that circuit, as might be required. That idea was repeatedly brought forward, and has been repudiated by our committee.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I yield. Mr. ADAMS. I simply want to supplement the Senator's statement by repeating what has already been said—that what was sought here was to get a court composed of men who are experts in this particular kind of law; that they would be reorganization experts. If they are reorganization experts, they are not the kind of men to send out to sit on the district bench, the trial bench, or to sit on the circuit court of appeals, because apparently we have taken the position that the district courts and the circuit courts of appeal are not now qualified to handle these things, so we are going to have a different type of qualifications.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not entirely agree with the statement of the Senator from Vermont. The testimony before our committee and the general understanding was that what we are particularly setting up the court for is because, as I pointed out a moment ago, there are some railroad receivership cases which have been pending for 35 years. Others have been pending for periods ranging from 5 years to 35 years. No one will deny that those things ought to be cleared up. Many of the judges will say to you, as they have testified in other investigations before the Senate, that their other duties take up so much of their time that they are not familiar with the reorganization law. They do not know much about it. They are indifferent to it. It is not that they have been dishonest, but generally they do not know anything about it.

I reluctantly came to the conclusion, after conferring with the Interstate Commerce Commission, with Jesse Jones, Chairman of the R. F. C., and with the chief counsel for the R. F. C., and the other groups, that this would be something which would tend to relieve the courts of a great deal of criticism. Many of the judges have said the same thing, and they have felt that it ought to be done.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, this is made mandatory, not permissive, but mandatory. It states that the judges "shall" be assigned. My view would be that it would be wise to strike out all of lines 6 to 10 and through the word "circuit" in line 11 on page 2.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I intend to offer an amendment along that line.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, it is not my intention now to press the point further. It is about 4:30 o'clock; is it intended that we vote on the bill this afternoon?

Mr. WHEELER. I hope we may. Can we not finish with the other amendments?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Mexico will yield, in connection with what the Senator from Montana has stated, everyone recognizes that there have been abuses in the matter of receiverships in the Federal courts. I do not think the abuses of receiverships with regard to railroads in the Federal courts have been particularly more glaring than abuses in connection with other forms of receivership. I do not know any particular reason why we should set up a separate court to deal with railroad receiverships more than the receiverships of utilities. There have been a great many abuses in those matters in the Federal courts.

My idea is that the logical way to deal with those matters is either by impeaching some Federal judges, which is the process provided by the Constitution of the United States, or by the Congress writing a substantive law regulating receiverships.

A very dear friend said to me a few minutes ago that he knew of several cases in the Federal courts in the city of Chicago where there had been disgraceful practices in connection with railroad receiverships. Several matters have been called to my attention relating to other sorts of receiverships in the Federal courts in the city of Chicago which I think are equally as important for the consideration of the Congress as is the matter of railroad receiverships.

It seems to me that if we have a venal Federal judiciary the judges ought to be impeached, and the guilty judges should be convicted and ousted from office. If the process under the Constitution at the present time is not sufficiently simple, we ought by a constitutional amendment, or by some way within the Constitution, simplify the process. I do not think that is a justification for the Committee on Interstate Commerce to come to the Senate with a proposal to essentially change the judicial structure of our Government. I have no objection to the Senate proceeding and completing the consideration of the committee amendments.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I assume the additional jurisdiction is proposed to be given, because it is contemplated that the work of the special court will be finished within a reasonable time.

Mr. WHEELER. That is true.

Mr. HATCH. Then there will be some judges on our hands, appointed for life, with nothing to do, unless we give them additional jurisdiction.

Mr. WHEELER. That is true.

Mr. HATCH. I concede that that presents a serious question, and if the Senator from Missouri should offer an amendment to strike out those provisions, we should think well of that situation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is it the understanding that we are to postpone the consideration of this particular matter?

Mr. WHEELER. No; it is not subject to amendment at the present time, because we are taking up the committee amendments by unanimous consent.

Mr. HATCH. I will desist until we conclude the consideration of committee amendments.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have no desire to delay the consideration of committee amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment of the committee was, on page 38, line 13, after the word "annual", to strike out the word "earnings" and to insert "net railway operating income"; on line 14, after the word "property", to insert the words "upon which a plan may safely be based consistently with the policy and standards set forth in subsection (u)"; and on page 39, line 4, after the words "of the", to strike out "second" and to insert "third", so as to read:

The expectable future average annual net railway operating income of any operating railroad property, upon which a plan may safely be based consistently with the policy and standards set forth in subsection (u), in the light of its earnings experience and of such changes as may reasonably be expected, applying the rebutable presumption set forth in subdivision (3) of subsection (u), and the maximum total capitalization, fixed charges, amount of fixed interest-bearing debt, cumulative contingent charges, amount of contingent interest-bearing debt and cumulative dividend requirements to which the property of the debtor, or of the railroad corporation in receivership, may safely be subjected consistently with the policy and standards set forth in subsection (u). If in its opinion there is good cause, the Commission may defer the determination of such maxima, or any of them, until consideration by it of the issuance of a certificate for the purpose of the third paragraph of subsection (d) as amended. If in its opinion there is good cause, either upon its own motion or upon petition the Commission in its discretion after due notice and hearing may revise such determinations. In making such determinations or revisions thereof, and in considering the issuance of such certificate the Commission shall disregard the question of the participation of the various classes of creditors and stockholders in any plan and the question of distribution of securities of and interests in the reorganized company to the various classes of creditors and stockholders. In fixing the time within which plans may be filed, the court shall give consideration to the time required for the making of such determinations so as to allow a reasonable time after such determinations for the filing of plans.

The amendments were agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment was amended earlier in the day on the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Austin], and the clerk will state the amendment as amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 39, line 22, after the word "shall", it is proposed to insert "(and in pending cases where the Commission has approved and certified a plan to the court prior to the effective date of the amendment made by section 9 of the Railroad Reorganization Act of 1939, or as provided in section 9 prior to the expiration of 9 months following the enactment of said Railroad Reorganization Act of 1939, in accordance with the provisions of subsection (d) of section 77 as they existed prior to such amendment, the court may)."

The next amendment was, on page 40, line 5, after the word "the" where it occurs the second time, to strike out "second" and insert "third", so as to read:

After the filing of any plan or plans the court, after such hearing, if any, as it may deem desirable, in order to facilitate the ultimate consumption of a plan and the issuance of securities pursuant thereto, shall (and in pending cases where the Commission has approved and certified a plan to the court prior to the effective date of the amendment made by section 9 of the Railroad Reorganization Act of 1939, or as provided in section 9, prior to the expiration of 9 months following the enactment of said Railroad Reorganization Act of 1939, in accordance with the provisions of subsection (d) of section 77 as they existed prior to such amendment, the court may) refer to the Commission for the consideration by it of the issuance of a certificate for the purposes of the last sentence of the third paragraph of subsection (d) as amended, one or more of the following: (1) Any plan as filed; (2) any modification of any plan as filed; (3) any plan promulgated by the court, if the court believes the plan or plans so referred are worthy of consideration. The Commission shall thereupon, within such reasonable time as the court shall fix or extend, certify to the court (together with the record on which such certificate is based) (1) that such plan or plans conform to the policy and standards set forth in subsection (u); or (2) in respect of any plan that it finds does not so conform, what modifications are requisite to conform such plan to such policy and standards. Upon receipt of such certificate, the court shall, after due notice to all stockholders and creditors given in such manner as it shall determine, hold public hearings, at which opportunity shall be given to any interested person to be heard, and following which the court shall render an opinion and order in which it shall render an opinion and order in which it shall refuse to approve any plan. In such opinions the court shall refuse to approve any plan. In such opinions the court shall state fully its conclusions and the reasons therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, line 11, after the word "section", to strike out "or in any proceeding for the reorganization of a railroad corporation (including specifically but not exclusively proceedings for postponements or modifications of debt, interest, rent, or maturities or modifications of capital structures) under the Bankruptcy Act, as now or hereafter amended, or any other Federal law", so as to read:

The court may thereafter, of its own motion, or on motion of any person in interest, and after due notice and hearing, in a supplemental opinion and order modify any plan which it has approved, stating the reasons for such modification. No plan shall be approved, confirmed, or otherwise made effective in any proceeding under this section, or in any receivership in any Federal court, unless (1) the Commission, after due notice and hearing, shall have certified that the said plan conforms to the policy and standards set forth in subsection (u); or unless (2) the said plan be a modification of a plan considered by the Commission and the court is satisfied that with respect to matters governed by the provisions of subsection (u), said plan is not inconsistent (a) with the provisions of a plan that has been considered by the Commission and certified by the Commission to conform to such policy and standards, or else (b) with the provisions of a plan, considered by the Commission, as modified in accordance with those modifications certified by the Commission as requisite; or unless (3) the said plan be one approved by the Commission and certified to the court prior to the effective date of the amendment made by section 9 of the Railroad Reorganization Act of 1939, or as provided in said section 9, prior to the expiration of 9 months following the enactment of said Railroad Reorganization Act of 1939, in accordance with the provisions of subsection (d) of section 77 of the Bankruptcy Act as they existed prior to such amendment.

The court shall, after notice in such manner as it may determine to the debtor, or the railroad corporation in receivership, its trustee or trustees, receiver or receivers, stock-holders, creditors, and the Commission, hear all persons in interest in support of, and in opposition to, such objections to the plan and such claims for equitable treatment. After such hearing, and without any hearing, if no objections are filed, the court shall approve the plan if satisfied that (1) it complies with the provisions of subsection (b) of this section, is fair and equitable, affords due recognition to the rights of each class of creditors and stockholders, does not discriminate unfairly in favor of any class of creditors or stockholders, and does not provide treatment to any creditor or stockholder or to any class of creditors or stockholders superior to that which might lawfully be accorded to them in an equity receivership; (2) the approximate amounts to be paid by the debtor or the railroad corporation in receivership, or by any person acquiring the assets thereof, or any assets pursuant to the plan, for expenses and fees incident to the reorganization, have been fully disclosed so far as they can be ascertained at the date of such hearing, are fair and reasonable, and are to be subject to the approval of the court; (3) the plan provides for the payment of all costs of administration and all other allowances made or to be made by the court except that allowances provided for in subsection (c), paragraph (12), of this section, may be paid in securities provided for in the plan if those entitled thereto will accept such pa in the same line, after the word "property", to insert "of the debtor or the railroad corporation in receivership"; and on page 47, line 5, after the word "section", to strike out "or in any proceeding for the reorganization of a railroad corporation (including specifically but not exclusively proceedings for postponements or modifications of debt, interest, rent, or maturities or modifications of capital structures) under the Bankruptcy Act, as now or hereafter amended, or any other Federal law", so as to read:

In any proceeding instituted or continued under this section, the court after due notice and hearing, may order the sale to the highest bidder, at public auction at not less than a fair upset price to be fixed by the court, of all or any part of the property of the debtor or the railroad corporation in receivership, either subject to or free from lien, for any purpose for which such sale might lawfully be ordered in an equity receivership, and the proceeds shall be equitably distributed. No sale to bidders pursuant to a plan shall be confirmed in a proceeding under this section, or in a receivership in any Federal court, unless such plan conforms to the requirements of this section, and unless the provisions of the last sentence of the third paragraph of subsection (d) have been complied with. If a successful bid be made pursuant to a plan accepted by or on behalf of creditors of any particular class holding two-thirds or more in amount of the total of the allowed claims of such class which have been reported in said submission as voting on said plan, or by or on behalf of stockholders of any particular class holding two-thirds or more of the stock of such class which have been reported in said submission as voting on said plan, or by or on behalf of stockholders of any particular class holding two-thirds or more of the stock of such class which has been reported in said submission as voting on said plan, other members of such particular class of creditors or stockholders, as the case may be, shall be bound by the provisions of the plan and need not be paid in cash out of the proceeds of sale unless the plan so provides.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, line 11, after the word "annual", to strike out "earnings" and insert "net railway operating income"; in line 13, before the word "giving", to insert "and"; and in line 16, after the word "therein", to insert "and other factors", so as to read:

If it shall be necessary to determine the value of any property for the purpose of any plan or of any sale at not less than a fair upset price, in any proceeding under this section, or in any receivership in any Federal court, the Commission shall determine such value, after due notice and hearing, and certify the same to the court, together with the record on which it is based, and, if supported by substantial evidence, such determination shall be conclusive. The Commission shall determine the value of any operating railroad property by capitalizing at a reasonable rate the expectable future average annual net railway operating income of the property, as determined by the Commission under subsection (d), and giving only such effect, if any, to the present cost of reproduction, either new or less depreciation, or to the original cost of the property, or to the actual investment therein and other factors as may be required by the Constitution of the United States in the determination of value for the particular purpose involved. In determining the reasonable rate so to be applied, the Commission shall consider the rates of return necessary to attract investments in other enterprises where the risk is comparable. The value of property other than operating railroad property shall be determined at its fair market value.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, line 24, after the word "proceeding", to insert "instituted or continued"; on page 49, line 3, before the word "as", to insert "or railroad corporation in receivership"; and in line 7, after the word "the" where it occurs the second time, to strike out "officers" and insert "officer", so as to read:

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I indicated a few moments ago, when I had the floor, that because of my great confidence in the Senator from Vermont and my high regard for the Senator from Montana many of the apprehensions which I had growing out of the pending bill would be allayed, and that perhaps I might vote for the bill. After further consideration, and weighing the terms of the bill as best I have been able without full opportunity for investigating it in all its implications, I have reached the conclusion that I cannot vote for the bill.

I am unwilling to have additional courts created. I think the statement made by the Senator from Idaho earlier in the debate indicates the unwisdom of this course. If we appoint a so-called railroad court, in the near future there will be a demand that we appoint a court to look after the oil fields, and the great business which has grown out of the automobile industry, and there will be demands from every other industry of any magnitude that special courts be set up for the determination of controversies between those organizations and the public, or among the stockholders and bondholders of the organizations.

Mr. President, the bill under consideration is one of great importance. It is a very long bill and contains provisions which are not, in my opinion, free from ambiguity and which may lead to conflicts between the court which is to be established and the Interstate Commerce Commission. I concede that an effort is made to clearly separate the functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission from the functions of the courts which are to be created. However, as indicated, the line of separation is so shadowy that I apprehend there will be overlapping of activities resulting in controversies.

I know that it is contended that the Interstate Commerce Commission is to be a fact-finding body and that its duties are largely administrative, but I fear that there will be differences of opinion as to where the administrative functions cease and where the judicial authority begins. It may be that situations will be presented where questions of fact and questions of law will be so intermingled and so commingled that it will be difficult to determine where the jurisdiction or administrative authority of a fact-finding body terminates and the judicial functions of the courts begin. Questions of fact not infrequently become questions of law, and, as indicated, the duties of the courts and of the Interstate Commerce Commission may not always be clearly defined.

The measure, as I have indicated, deals with a wide range of subjects and contains provisions of great importance. my opinion, but few Members of the Senate have read the bill and fewer Members are familiar with all of its provisions. The bill covers 76 pages of printed matter, and its announced purpose is to protect railroads engaged in interstate commerce from the dangers of unsound financial structures; also to establish questions of procedures and standards for the financial rehabilitation of interstate railroads as well as for other purposes. It provides for a railroad reorganization court whose jurisdiction extends to any property involved, no matter where located. It is to be known as a railroad reorganization court and shall exercise all the powers of district courts of the United States and the circuit courts of appeals. It is to take over all proceedings now pending in the courts. The bill creates a new judicial body authorized to appoint a large staff, including marshals, clerks, investigators, and so forth.

May I say in passing that Congress has been most generous in the creation of Federal agencies, endowing them with great power and providing them with an ever-increasing number of officials and employees. The Constitution provides for a Federal judiciary, and Congress has not, as I have stated, been unmindful of the importance of providing judicial machinery to meet the growing economic, industrial, and political needs of the people. I think it may be said that the Federal courts have performed their duties with ability and maintained a high standard of judicial integrity. No human institution is perfect, and judges, as well as legislators and persons in other spheres of life, are not free from imperfections, but I think it may be said that the Federal judiciary system has met with ability and honor the responsibilities resting upon it. I do not mean to contend that the conduct of every judge has been free from criticism, but I think that it may be safely said that their record for probity, integrity, and ability has not been surpassed, if it has been equaled, by those in other departments of the Government.

There has been criticism of the delays in dealing with the reorganization of the railroads, and occasionally courts are criticized for not promptly disposing of cases before them. In my opinion delays may, in most instances, be chargeable to litigants and their companies. In many bankruptcy and receivership cases delays are to be attributed not to the courts but to those litigants and those interested in the litigation. In many receivership cases parties interested, including bondholders, creditors, and stockholders, are averse to the prompt disposition of proceedings by the sale of assets of the corporation or the winding up of the receivership. They hope that conditions may develop by delay, and wise and judicious handling of the assets of the corporation reorganization may result advantageously to both creditor and stockholder. It is not an easy task to deal with railroads which are in financial straits. As indicated, all interested parties-bondholders, stockholders, and the public generallyare interested in conserving the assets and in restoring the corporation to a condition where it will be able to operate and perform the purposes for which it was organized. It is quite likely that in some cases the expectations of the parties interested were not realized, and that prompt liquidation of the assets or prompt reorganization would have been the wiser and better course.

In a colloquy with one of the Senators a few moments ago I stated that in some instances the condition of the railroads was such as to call for prompt reorganization, and even to accomplish that result, foreclosure proceedings, followed by a sale of the assets, was the wiser course to follow. However, as I have indicated, there is usually great reluctance to adopt drastic steps calling for bankruptcy proceedings, including the sale of the assets of the defaulting organizations.

Mr. President, it seems to me that unsatisfactory as is the condition of many of the railroads, the situation does not require legislation such as that contemplated in the bill before us. I do not believe it necessary to create a new court to deal with the railroad situation. The Interstate Commerce Commission's powers to deal with the railroads are very great, and with the authority that the Federal courts possess there is not sufficient reason to enact a measure such as the one under consideration.

I am not blaming the courts for the delays in the settlement of many of those questions which have been before them. I do not think the judges to be appointed would be any different from those who now preside over our courts. As I have indicated, they will have the same weaknesses and the same virtues. They will be characterized by the same judicial knowledge or lack of judicial knowledge. I am willing to trust the judges now upon the bench.

Moreover, I am not in favor of a policy of bringing these railroad controversies to Washington. For instance, if there is a controversy in Maine, or in Massachusetts, or in California, or in Minnesota over some railroad, I see no reason why the trial of the controversy should be transferred to the District of Columbia.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I think the Senator from Utah is speaking under a misapprehension concerning the significance of the bill. The trials in reorganization cases, where it is necessary to hold hearings, are not transferred to Washington by the provisions of the bill. Jurisdiction is transferred to Washington, but the work of handling the matters with respect to operation of the matters shall remain where it is now. is peremptory, and only that part related to other things besides operation is left in the discretion even of the Railroad Reorganization Court. So it seems to me that it does not appear that the business of reorganizations of railroads is all coming down here to Washington to be tried. In these cases where it has been started elsewhere it is quite likely that both matters-that is, matters of operation and matters not of operation-will be left where they are for those district judges to finish.

Mr. KING. I assume from what the Senator from Vermont said that he is proceeding upon the theory that there will be no further litigation, just winding up the cases that are now pending. I have no doubt there will be future litigation.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield? Mr. KING. Yes; I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. There is also provision relating to future cases, permitting the reorganization court to impose upon any district judge anywhere in the land this work which is of a local character.

Mr. KING. I am familiar with that provision, and I was about to advert to the fact that the bill recognizes the unwisdom perhaps of bringing all litigants in all controversies to the Capital of the Nation, and therefore it gives the right to impose upon district judges who are now upon the bench. or those who may be subsequently called to judicial positions, to dispose of questions arising in their respective jurisdictions.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. The Senator said "all controversies." He means all controversies with reference to reorganization?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. President, there are many other objections to the bill which I shall not take the time of the Senate to delineate. It seems to me under all the circumstances that there is no reason for the creation of another court. I know the disposition of the Congress to create more bureaus and more Federal organizations, and to multiply the large personnel now existing in the Federal Government. It seems to me that the present judicial system, with all its imperfections and all human institutions have their imperfections—is adequate to meet our social, our political, our industrial, and our economic needs. Therefore, Mr. President, without taking any further time of the Senate, I announce my purpose to vote against the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the paragraph on page 48, line 24. The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, line 19, after the word "debtor", to insert "or the railroad corporation in receivership"; on page 50, line 1, after the word "debtor" to insert "or the railroad corporation in receivership"; in line 11, after the word "debtor", to insert "to the railroad corporation in receivership"; in line 13, after the word "debtor", to insert "or the railroad corporation in receivership"; in line 15, after the word "debtor", to insert "or the railroad corporation in receivership"; in line 17, before the word "shall", to insert "or the railroad corporation in receivership"; in line 22, after the word "hereunder", to insert "the receiver or receivers"; in the same line, after the word "debtor", to insert "the railroad corporation in receivership"; in line 24, after the word "debtor", to insert "or of the rail-road corporation in receivership"; on page 51, line 2, after the word "debtor", to insert "or the railroad corporation in receivership"; in line 4, after the word "trustees", to insert a comma and "receiver or receivers"; in line 6, after the word "trustees", to insert "receiver or receivers"; on page 52, line 7, after the word "the" where it occurs the first time, to strike out "debtor or" and insert "debtor"; in line 8, after the word "trustees", to insert "or by the receiver or receivers"; and in line 11, after the word "debtor", to insert "or the railroad corporation in receivership", so as to read:

(g) If in the light of all the existing circumstances there is undue delay in a reasonably expeditious reorganization of the debtor in a proceeding instituted under this section, the court, in its discretion, shall, on motion of any party in interest or on its own motion, after hearing and after consideration of the recommendation of the Commission, if any, dismiss the proceedings. The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the committee amendment.

The bill is still before the Senate and open to further amendment.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I suggest that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Adams] offer the amendment which he has prepared on the jurisdictional question.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, the amendment I wish to offer is to strike out, on page 2, lines 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, down to and including the word "circuit" in line 11. That would remove the roving and assignable character of the judges.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am entirely in sympathy with the amendment of the Senator from Colorado. As a matter of fact, I myself had written out and intended to offer the same amendment, but I have an amendment which I desire to offer to an earlier portion of the bill, which it seems to me might readily be considered before the amendment of the Senator from Colorado, although if the Senator from Colorado desires to proceed I shall be glad to have him do so.

My first amendment, Mr. President, would be to strike out, in line 6, page 1, the words "Court of the United States", and insert in lieu thereof the word "tribunal."
